DEFYING THE FATES.

BY MAY HUNTLEY.

"I think it is too awfully provoking, Laurie,"

Kittie Casiee sat on the top rail of a zig zag fence, swinging her straw hat by the ribbons, and beating an impatient little tattoo on a lower rail with her dainty foot. Not a very significant beating, but Kitty, with her mischievous, piquant prettiness, never looked ungraceful or out of place anywhere. Her hair was a fluffy mass of silken brown threads. Beating about a saucy, sparkling face, and her dancing stars with the shadow of a pettish cloud coming over them as she addressed the very young man leaning moodily against the post at her side.

"I shall be more unhappy than you—but there is no help for it."

"All our fun will be spoiled. We can not row on the river, or ride or drive, or hunt geological specimens, or fish or—anything, just because of a lot of stupid company that no one want's to see."

"Oh, yes, my respected aunt will be delighted, and I am expected to go into ecstasies of bliss. You know this Miss Cordelia Ledyard, who is coming with her highly cultured mamma, to pay my aunt a visit, is a distant relative, and designed by the fates to be my wife, and this time the fates are represented by Aunt Talcott and Mrs. Ledyard."

"Oh! Then I suppose you will soon be married. I hate married men."

"But I do not want to marry her. I would rather be with you, Kittie. Will you miss me very much in your rambles if I can not join you for awhile?"

"Oh, no. I have no doubt I shall enjoy myself very much. If I need any assistance in rowing or gathering shells, Allen Thorpe will be only too glad to accompany me."

"Bother Allen Thorpe! How can you endure him? I am going to run away. I shall have very urgent business in L——, and I shall ride out to see you every day."

"You will do nothing so ridiculous, Laurie Talcott. Go and help your aunt entertain her guests, and, if you fall in love with Miss Ledyard, marry her—when you are a few years older—and live happily ever afterward."

"But I never will marry her, that's certain."

"What! displease the kind aunt who has brought you up—who is going to establish you in business, and leave you all her property when she dies? Do you want to give up your favorite tailor, your boat, your horses and dogs, and make brooms or sweep chimneys—live in a hut without windows, and eat black bread and bean soup three times a day?"

"It's a doleful picture, isn't it, Kittie? I wish Miss Ledyard would refuse me!"

Do you really? Well what kind of a lady is she, and what kind of people does she like?"

"Oh, she is a nice enough little person, as I remember her—haven't seen her for three years, you know. She has been made the victim of all her mother's literary hobbies, and has been kept at books until she is a walking encyclopedia of information, and frightens me when I try to talk to her. But it has had the effect of making her hate other students. I have heard her say nothing could ever induce her to like a literary or studious man. She despised them; they were always so lean and learned and solemn. I was considerably bookish in those days myself, trying to get through college creditably, and I wondered then if books would be my ruin."

"Then, if you really wish her to refuse you, turn bookworm. Get a pair of wise looking spectacles, acquire a studious frown, brush up a lot of profound phrases and incomprehensible words, and never be found outside the library, or without a book in your hands."

"I'll do it! and I say, Kitty, you won't let Allen Thorpe hang around you too much, will you? Wait till I am safely rejected, and I'll devote the rest of my life to you."

"Don't worry about me till you are rejected. Now help me down, and then go home. My mamma will want me."

When Mrs. Ledyard and her daughter arrived, Laurence was nowhere to be seen. When he appeared, after repeated calls, it was with disheveled hair, inky fingers, a pair of near-sighted glasses over his nose, a big open volume in his hands, and a very absent-minded air withal.

Miss Ledyard was lying on the sofa in a very languid and exhausted attitude and barely looked up as he entered, exposing herself in a faint voice, because of her weak state.

"An invalid! Worse than ever!" thought Laurence, "the very thing that makes me most unhappy. Miserable it is a sickly woman. I never know what to do with them. Not much invalidism about Kitty, bless her vigorous little heart."

Aunt Talcott looked in surprise from one to the other of her favorites.

"What is the matter with you two? Laurence, what have you been doing to yourself? And, Cordelia, when did you become an invalid?"

"Cordelia has seemed to be ailing for several days," said her mamma, anxiously. "I scarcely know what to think of her case. I am hoping your country air will benefit her."

"I have never been strong, mamma," answered the invalid; "but of late I have found it impossible to dissemble,"

"My poor daughter!" and she hastened to place the pillow more comfortably, and to smooth her brow.

"I deeply sympathize with my afflicted cousin. My dear aunt, are you not aware that the greatest portion of my time is occupied in scientific research! I occasionally resort to Nature's limitless sanitarium for essential exercise; but every available moment is spent in study."

"First I've heard of it," said Aunt Talcott, curtly, and Miss Ledyard might have been heard to ejaculate under her breath:

"A bookworm! Oh, oh!"

Laurence played his part well. He was seldom seen without one or two dreadful volumes about him, an abstracted look, and a studious stoop, and only spoke in polysyllables.

Miss Ledyard appeared to pass her life in a reclining position, to favor wrappers at all times of day, and usually kept her pretty head effectually covered with a black silk shawl. In vain her mamma entreated her to "make an effort" to put more life in her conversation and her countenance, to allow herself to be becomingly dressed, and in vain did Aunt Talcott scold Laurie and urge him to be more attentive and agreeable. The elder ladies could do nothing with the incorrigible young people.

Laurence found many a stolen opportunity to visit Kittie, and her rosy cheeks, sparkling eyes and buoyant spirits were decidedly refreshing after the hospital like constraint of the old mansion. He began to realize more than ever before how deeply in love he was. One day he decided to live to himself that he might give vent to his suppressed vitality, and announced at the breakfast table, "that a matter pertaining to a recent scientific discovery rendered a journey to the city imperative."

He managed to steal away unobserved, as he was wearing his favorite loose sailor suit and straw hat—went after Kittie and took his boat for a trip seven miles up the river to a celebrated hill dignified by the name of Cramer mountain. The ladies at home little suspected that his researches were made in a trim sail-boat or on the top of a green mountain, in company with a vivacious girl, who did not care an iota for science, and that the researches were continued by the side of the same maiden as in the golden stillness of a summer afternoon they floated down the stream and whispered the old, old story, ever new to each successive generation.

He had promised Kittie's mamma to bring her home early, and from there went directly to his own home, forgetting that the city train was not due for two hours yet. Careless and happy-hearted he dashed into the library with his straw hat on the back of his curly head, his eyes bright with gayety and his mouth puckered in a merry whistle, little resembling the spectacled, black-capped, stoop-shouldered student who had been haunting the library for several days past.

His progress and his tune came to a sudden stop as his eyes fell upon an occupant of the room.

A graceful figure in fleecy white, occasional knots of pale pink ribbon preventing it from floating away in a mist, altogether, was perched on the top of a step-ladder, examining the title of the books.

A pretty face turned partly from him, brightened by a delicate glow on cheeks and lips, and shaded by a wealth of golden-brown curls shone out from the shadows in the old room. A silvery voice trilled out a roulade of musical notes and presently a bound landed the young lady at his feet—in person, Cordelia Ledyard.

They gazed at each other in silence for a whole minute.

"Then you are not an invalid? Or has there been a miraculous cure?" Laurie asked, presently.

"You do not look very dreadfully learned just at present. Have you acquired all knowledge, or have you given up in despair, and concluded to be just careless, gay young man and nothing more?"

"It is no use pretending, Delia, I was playing a part."

She laughed merrily,

"For the same reason, I wonder, that I have been making myself so uncomfortable?"

"And were you dissembling, too?" Laurence asked, with rather an aggrieved air.

"Was I not? Candidly, I was never in better health in my life. You may imagine I must have been desperate to resort to making myself hideous in the eyes of a good-looking young gentleman like yourself. You know we have been taught to believe we were made for each other, and I have had it impressed upon me for years that I must not refuse you when you asked me to marry you. There is a somebody else who says"—this with a droop of the head and a blush—"that I was made for him instead, and I am inclined to think so, too, and so resolved you should never ask me. I remembered a certain repugnance you used to possess for invalids, or weak, complaining people, and this explains my very weak and exhausted state since my arrival. And you it seems, dividing my dislike to bookish people, have assumed a studious role, so that I should refuse you when you propesed. Well, we need be afraid of each other no longer."

"Well said, dear coz, I like you immensely, and I beg your pardon for being afraid you would accept me. We will be jolly good friends hereafter, and I will introduce you to the dearest and best girl in the world; you can't help but like her and she will make your visit pleasanter than I could alone."

"I understand and love her already but what shall we say to our respective fates, if we thus thwart their decrees?"

"Say that we both love another and could not resist a stronger fate than theirs. Say that we are good frends, but never can be lovers, and if they turn us out into the world to wander like bakes in the wood, we will go, and depend on the robbins to feed us. But I know they love us too well, and am certain it will end in a 'lived happily ever afterward.'"

Laurence was right.

His Lavatory.

"Have you a bath room in the house?" asked a Boston guest of a Western Landlord.

"A what?"

"A bawth room, a-a lavatory."

"Blamed if I know what you're driving at."

"He wants to clean up," said a bystander, better versed in polite language.

"Aw, that's it," said the landlord. "You'd ort to have said so at first, come along with me."

And he led the man from Boston out in the back yard, where there was a rusty tin pan and a pail of "roily" water on the stump of a butternut tree.

"There ye are," he said proudly; "splash away all yer mind to. I'll send the towel out soon as them folks up stairs gets done with it. Pitch in; there ain't no extra charge fer the lavatory, as you call it; and there's a bucket of soft soap on that bench. Use all you've a mind to of it."

California, says the Chicago News, has some big orchards, and the largest is in the Suisun valley, and is owned by A. T. Hatch, President of the California Fruit Union. Mr. Hatch has 200 acres in pear trees, 189 in peaches, 70 in apricots, 10 in nectarines, 210 in almonds, 40 in cherries, 100 in plums and prunes, besides 40 of currants and gooseberries, and hundreds of lemon and orange trees. Of these acres, 300 bore fruit this season to the amount of 2,000 tons, which brought the owner $100,000. He calculates that when the whole orchard is in full bearing it will produce 8,000 tons of fruit, worth $400,000.

The stone is hard and the drop is small, but a hole is made by the constant fall.

FROM DAY TO DAY.

Only from day to day
We hold our way.
Uncertain ever,
Though hope and gay desire
Touch with their fire
Each fresh endeavor.

Only from day to day
We grope our way
Through hurrying hours;
But still our castles fair
Lift to the air
Their glistening towers.

And still from day to day
Along the way
Beckon us ever,
To follow, follow, follow,
O'er hill and hollow,
With fresh endeavor.

Sometimes, triumphant, gay,
The bugles play
And trumpets sound
From out those glistening towers,
And rainbow showers
Bedew the ground;

Then "sweet, oh, sweet the way,"
We smiling say,
And forward press
With swift, impatient feet
And hearts that beat
With eagerness.

Yet still beyond, the gay
Sweet bugles play,
The trumpets blow,
How'er we flying haste,
Or lagging waste,
The hours that go;

Still far and far away,
Till comes the day
We gain that peak
In Darien; then, blind
No more, we find,
Perchance, what we do seek,

SKATING FOR LIFE.

Remarkable Escape of a Confederate Prisoner.

The snow, which had been coming down for hours, gradually ceased, the soft flakes changing into an icy sleet, stinging the faces of pedestrians, and converting the feathery covering of the streets into a sheet of glass, over which locomotion was becoming more and more impracticable. The leafless branches of the trees along the sidewalks swayed in the rising wind, dropping fragments of ice upon the heads of the passers-by, and occasionally, no longer able to sustain their icy burden, coming down with a sharp crash on the pavement below.

The office of Messrs. Simmes & Harcourt, Attorneys at Law, presented a cheerful contrast to the dreary scene without. A huge bed of coals glowed in the open grate, and lit up still more brightly the crimson rug and curtains. The two gentlemen, themselves the only occupants of the room, seemed to fully appreciate their agreeable situation, as seated before the fire, they allowed newspapers and chat to supersede, for the nonce, briefs and lawbooks.

"Skating at the Park,'" said Mr. Simmes, the junior partner, as a street car bearing the announcement in large letters rolled by within sight of the window. "That little flag will bring joy to the hearts of the skaters."

"I confess," said Mr. Harcourt, folding up his newspaper, "that I still enjoy the sport as much as the young people. It puts young blood in the veins—skimming over an icy floor, through an icy atmosphere. Now this roller-skating is a miserable substitute. I suppose that is the only kind you ever enjoyed, Simmes, in your benighted section, where you can hardly save ice enough to cool your summer drinks."

"You are very much mistaken, my dear fellow," rejoined his companion, returning from the window where he had been viewing the arctic scene below. "In my section, as you call it, I have felt as cold weather as here—perhaps I'll except the present 'blizzard.' You remember I came from Kentucky. We had splendid skating almost every year."

"Indeed! You indulge in it here, then, I suppose."

"No," said Mr. Simmes, "never. I have not skated," he continued, reflectively, "for twenty years: and then I skated for my life."

"What!" exclaimed his friend, "were the wolves after you?"

Mr. Simmes smiled. "Yes," he said, "the wolves were after me; and nearly got me, too."

"My dear fellow!" cried his companion, lapping him upon the shoulder, "is it possible I've known you so long, and you've never told me such an adventure! Here, sit down! We have nothing specially important on hand this afternoon, so suppose we devote it to the recital."

"Well, if you are willing to run the risk of being bored. But perhaps your sympathies will be on the side of the pursuers."

"What! the wolves!"

Simmes laughed. "They were not beasts," he rejoined, "they were human wolves; or perhaps that is too harsh a term to apply to them. They were simply doing their duty in trying to catch me."

"You are growing mysterious, Simmes. I guess the sheriff and his posse were after you. Was it arson or murder that you had committed?"

"Neither. In fact I had committed no crime, that I was aware of, and yet I was escaping for my life, and my pursuers were perfectly right in endeavoring to capture me."

"Well, no more riddles, if you please. My curiosity is sufficiently whetted, so proceed:" and Mr. Harcourt settled himself comfortably back in his chair in the attitude of a listener.

His partner sat meditating for several moments. "Twenty years ago," he said; "that is a long time, Harcourt. It makes me feel quite elderly to think that I was twenty-four years old then."

"Well, I was nearly thirty then." Mr. Harcourt vouchsafed this comforting piece of information, and his companion continued.

"It was in the winter of '65, when the whole country was involved in war. The fortunes of the Confederacy were looking pretty gloomy—at least it seemed so to us, poor fellows, who were spending the winter at Johnson's Island."

"Johnson's Island?" His listener leaned forward attentively.

"Yes, 'in prison on Lake Erie.' Once the lake was frozen over, and our guards and the prison employes amused themselves by skating; and as we were taken out to go through our daily exercise we were allowed the privilege of watching them. I don't think there was a man among the prisoners, besides my myself, who had ever had on skates; and the guards urged, and even insisted on our trying them, for the diversion our awkward attempts afforded them. The poor fellows were nothing loath to engage in any thing that broke the monotony of prison life, and loud and many were the shouts of laughter that echoed over the lake as the luckless tyros, one after another, came to an ignominious fate.

"In my Kentucky home I had been accustomed to the sport every winter, and was accounted the champion skater of the neighborhood. Many a time had I distanced a whole party of young people in a race up the river, and I prided myself on my accomplishment. This, however, I kept a profound secret; for the wild thought had entered my brain, 'why not make my escape in this way?' Once across the lake and in the woods, pursuit would be next to impossible; and I trusted to luck—and pluck—to work my way home.

"If my skill and speed were only equal to what they once were, I felt sure the thing was feasible. But I had not been on skates for three years, and months of prison fare and inactive life had greatly weakened me. However, I gladly seized the opportunity of trying, but always feigned reluctance and timidity whenever I ventured out; and many were the awkward slips and tumbles I purposely made. I would have given any thing to have dared, just for a few slides, to give my powers full play, just to satisfy myself that my old skill was as good as ever; but this would betray me, so I affected to be as awkward as the others; yet all the while the old familiar feeling would come back to me at each step I took, and I felt sure, if I once plunged forward, I could skim over that lake like a bird.

"We had been amusing ourselves thus for two days, when, on the third, as we were marshaled out to our daily exercise, the guard remarked: 'Guess there'll be no more skating after to-day, boys. There'll be a thaw pretty soon, so you'd better make the most of it this morning.'

"I felt the blood rush to my face as he spoke. Should I dare to try it to-day? It was my last chance. I thought of my old mother at home, who was wearing away her heart for her boy, and I resolved to make the attempt.

"There were no signs of a thaw yet, as we came down to the lake, but the temperature was decidedly milder than it had been for several days. I watched the boys buckling on their skates, and then slowly put on mine. I examined them carefully, to see that they were sound in every respect, buckle and tongue and all, good for a two or three mile race.

"As good luck would have it, none of our guards accompanied us on the ice this morning, so secure did they feel of our inability to get beyond their reach, but sat or stood around in the sun, prepared to enjoy to the utmost our awkward feats.

"Well, I started off at last, very cautiously at first, as though afraid to trust my insecure footing. My object was to get as far as possible from land and the armed guard before I made a dash for freedom. I would go a few paces, then fall and roll over, apparently, in the most helpless manner imaginable. But I managed at each tumble to get a little farther away, till at last I was about fifty yards from the shore, and quite a distance from the rest of the party before I attracted any attention. Then a loud voice from the guards sung out:

"'Hello! you there, Johnny Reb! Come! tumble back this way, and be quick about it.'

"I immediately 'tumbled,' but not in their direction. 'I'm coming,' I cried, 'if I can ever stand on this plaguy slippery thing;' and sitting down I commenced to slide around in the most awkward and grotesque fashion."

Here the narrative was interrupted by a sudden laugh from Mr. Harcourt. "What a figure you cut—must have cut," he said.

"Yes, indeed; and the guard on shore greeted my maneuvres, and those of my equally graceful companions, with shouts of laughter, and such complimentary ejaculations as 'bull-frog,' 'terrapin,' etc.

"I slowly scrambled to my feet, and, while apparently endeavoring to steady myself, rapidly took in the situation. I was fully sixty yards from the shore. Not one of the guards was on the lake, and it would take some moments to buckle on the skates. They would have their guns, too, which would impede their progress. As all this flitted through my mind, I was slowly shuffling back and forth, as though making my way toward them. I saw that at the moment their attention was diverted from me by the gyrations of the other prisoners. I wheeled and sped up the lake like a shot.

"Oh! the delicious sensation that tingled through every nerve and fiber of my frame as I flew like a bird over the ice. In a moment I was on the river at my old Kentucky home, leaving my competitors far in the rear. But now the race was for freedom—for life—and I felt all my old skill and fleetness return to me fourfold at the thought.

"But loud cries, followed by rapid shots, now came from the shore. I glanced back and saw the guards scrambling into their skates, while the prisoners were staring in stupid amazement at my flying form. So great was the exhilaration of my physical nature I could not realize the tremendous danger I was in. I laughed aloud and clapped my hands in an ecstacy of excitement. I felt as though I had wings, so smooth and rapid was my flight—wings to my heels, if not to my shoulders, as I fled on, like a modern Mercury.

"I instinctively bent my course toward the mainland lying some half-mile away, but of course had no idea of attempting a landing until I had quite distanced my pursuers; for only on the ice could I hope to prove a match for them. That they were following in eager and enraged pursuit, I felt sure; for 'Halt! Halt!' was borne on the wind, and shot after shot came whizzing through the icy air.

"I glanced back. Five or six of them were in full chase, and they were fine skaters, too, for I could see the speed at which they came. But for the good start I had made, I had surely been overtaken. On and on I sped. Trees and other objects on land, which I gradually neared, flew by me like figures in a kaleidoscope. The cold wind whistled through my hair and clothing, but my whole body was aglow with the rapid motion and excitement.

"I suddenly remembered the guard's remark about the coming thaw. What if I should come to thin ice, and find a cold and watery grave! Oh, that there only were 'Danger' signals ahead! But the danger signals behind me were sufficient to drive me on to any that might lie before.

"On I flew. What distance I was making I could hardly guess, but certainly two or three miles must now lie between me and my prison home. But at last the long continued and unwonted exertion began to tell on me. My breath came short and quick, and my heart beat to suffocation. I could not keep it up very much longer, I felt sure. Again I looked back. Far in the distance four or five men were still struggling on; but, away in advance of them, one resolute fellow was rushing toward me with headlong speed. Though I kept steadily on, as I looked I saw, to my dismay, that he was gaining on me. He was near enough for me to perceive by his dress that he was an officer, and not being encumbered with heavy fire-arms was thus able, I suppose, to make the time he did. I gathered up all my energies to make one last and desperate effort to distance him. My limbs began to tremble. Months of prison life and prison fare had made me weaker than, in the first spurt, I had realized.

"Halt!" came within fifty feet of me, and a pistol-ball whistled through my hair and took off my hat. At the same moment a crackling sound came from under my feet, I staggered, lurched violently to one side, then lost my balance and rolled over and over on the yielding ice.

"'All is over now,' I thought; for I felt too utterly exhausted even to attempt to rise. But, just as all hope forsook me, a loud crash aroused me, and I turned my head just in time to see my pursuer go down in the treacherous chasm in which I had been so nearly engulfed. Then I knew that I was saved; and with suddenly renewed strength I got to my feet again and made off. I continued for a half-mile further up, and then made straight for the shore. There I unstrapped my skates and took refuge in a deep thicket, and in a few minutes was in a profound sleep.

"I wonder, now, that I had not frozen to death; and had not the weather moderated greatly in the last few hours, I am sure I would have done so. When I finally woke, I was stiff with cold, and ached from head to foot."

Here Mr. Simmes paused, and gave a retrospective shiver as he leaned over the fire.

"And what became of the poor fellow who went under the ice?" asked Mr. Harcourt.

"Drowned, I suppose; I hoped so at the time, at any rate. I never saw him again. Well, that is the last time I skated," continued Mr. Simmes, rising, and standing with his back comfortably turned to the fire. "I've never had the least fancy for the exercise since."

"But pray continue your narrative," said Mr. Harcourt, as he rose and stood on the rug beside his friend. "I can't bear to think of you in that thicket with frozen limbs and aching bones."

"Haven't I bored you enough already? You know I only promised to tell you my last experience on the skates."

"Indeed, I have an intense curiosity to know how you got along afterwards."

Mr. Simmes resumed his seat, and continued: "When I awoke it was almost sunset. I was in a dense wood, with no sign of habitation within sight. That I should find food and shelter for the night was imperatively necessary; so I slowly got to my feet and looked around. There seemed to be no outlet, not even a cow-path. I commenced my journey inland, however, making my way through the thick underbrush and over frozen streams, till, finally, after an hour's weary walking, I came across a little path. This I followed for some time, when, at a sudden bend, I saw, a few rods before me, a comfortable farm-house, lights gleaming from the windows, and a general air of hospitality pervading the whole premises.

"I approached with considerable trepidation, for I judged that my forlorn, bareheaded appearance would be decidedly against me. My timid knock at the door was answered by a young girl, whom I thought the most beautiful creature I had ever beheld, having been thrown for so many months into the society of rough men only. In the most graceful manner that was possible under the circumstances, I begged for a night's lodging, saying I had lost my way. The young lady questioned me closely, and I suppose I must have made some very inconsistent statements; for at length, to my surprise and dismay, she said: 'You are an escaped prisoner, are you not?'

"I was speechless, and could only look at her beseechingly. She laughed heartily, but, in a moment, said gravely: 'Don't be afraid, I will help you; but father mustn't know it, for the world. Come in!' and I followed her into a cozy sitting-room, where an elderly lady was preparing a table for supper. She introduced me to her mother, and, after telling who I was, between them they hastily devised means for secreting me for the night.

"As the man of the house was expected at any moment, I was conducted to a little room somewhat apart from the rest of the house. Here this angel-girl brought me my supper. 'You must be off by daylight,' she said, 'but I will see you again.'

"It was hardly dawn when a tapping at my window roused me. After hastily dressing I came out. Would you believe me! there stood my lovely hostess with a bundle in her hand, and a horse, saddled and bridled, beside her.

"'You must be right off,' she said. 'Here are some things you might need, and money;' thrusting a purse into my hand. 'And this horse is my very own. You must take him, and may return him "when this cruel war is over."'

"She hardly gave me time to thank her I was overwhelmed by her kindness, as you may imagine.

"'I will most certainly return,' I said, pressing her hand. Then she gave me directions as to my course, and I departed.

"It would be more tedious than interesting to tell how, after a long journey across the State of Ohio, I finally crossed the river and reached my Kentucky home. From exposure and long imprisonment, I fell very ill. When I was at last able to report for duty again, the fortunes of the Confederacy were about decided. News of the surrender at Appomattox reached us just as I was planning a way to join General Lee's army." Here the narrator ceased.

"My dear fellow," said Mr. Harcourt, "I am heartily glad to hear of the successful termination of your adventure. I have always had quite a curiosity as to your ultimate fate."

"Always?" Mr. Simmes looked up inquiringly.

Mr. Harcourt indulged in a long, low chuckle. "Yes, ever since I came out of the icy bath I got on your account. You don't recognize the officer who pursued you 'to the bitter end,' and I tell you it was bitter cold under that ice. Well, of course twenty years does make a difference."

Mr. Simmes looked blankly in his companion's face. "What!" he gasped. "You? You don't say so!—and you weren't drowned after all?"

"No, but I came pretty near it. If some of the men hadn't seen me go under, and come up as quickly as they did, I would not now have had the pleasure of listening to your interesting story and congratulating you upon its fortunate issue."

"Well," said Mr. Simmes with a laugh, as the quondam foes involuntarily shook hands, "we long ago agreed to 'clasp hands over the bloody chasm,' and we'll now do so over the icy chasm."

"And how about your return?" asked Mr. Harcourt. "Did you ever see your little Yankee friend again? And did she ever see her horse?"

Mr. Simmes smiled. "Early in the autumn, when my health was fully restored, and the smoke of battle had quite cleared away, I mounted that trusty steed and made a pilgrimage back to the fair owner."

"And how did she receive you? I am really quite interested in the little heroine, disloyal though she was."

"Yes, she was shockingly disloyal," resumed Mr. Simmes, "for the 'aid and comfort' she gave the rebel prisoner, I pursuaded her to continue during life. Well, the long and short of it is, my dear fellow, the 'little Yankee heroine' is now my wife, Mrs. Simmes, whom you have often had the pleasure of meeting."—Gretna Green, in Demorest's Monthly.

THE NATIONAL BIRD.

Story of Two Eagles on Exhibition in a Norwich (Conn.) Store.

The Legislature in 1883 enacted a law making the penalty for the offense of killing an American eagle a fine of from $25 to $50 and the cost of prosecution, or an imprisonment of not more than thirty days. Having adopted the statute, it was at once placed in the archives of inert laws, in the number of which Connecticut is distinguished above other States, and the American eagle was shot with reinvigorated impunity. With characteristic spirit, country hunters who prior to the passage of the law had not cared much about shooting American eagles, neglected no opportunity to bring down the bird of freedom.

For reasons not understood by local ornithologists the Thames river valley has always been a favored haunt of the national bird. In the past fifteen years every eagle that has been killed in the State, with the exception of one or two shot in Fairfield County, has been killed in this valley. Almost daily an eagle may be seen above this river, sometimes a mere speck against the blue dome, often hovering over a valley farmstead to find out whether the farmer has any thing good to eat in his poultry yard, or winging his way treacherously under the banks, looking for a chance to rob an industrious fishhawk of his fresh fish. From the valley the eagles sometimes journey over to Stonington, and even to Rhode Island in search of meat, fish and clams on the long, lonely beaches.

It was the intent of the eagle statute to preserve the Thames river valley as a breeding place, the legislators being moved by a laudable fear that if the destruction of the bird went on there would not be eagles enough left in the State after a few years for Fourth of July celebrations and other patriotic purposes; but it is apparent that the American eagle can look out for himself without the help of Hartford and in spite of lawless hunters. Within a week or two four handsome birds have been shot in this part of the State, three in the valley, and one near Westerly, by a small boy with a rusty musket. The handsomest bird, which is a giant, has been set up, and is now on public exhibition in a store window in this city, in undesigned evidence of the efficacy of Connecticut statutes. It is not so bald as the bald eagle of Westchester, but its feathers are very thin on the top of its head, and there is a beautiful cape of white feathers under its wings, with a band of white about the neck.

In the window it is in the distinguished company of a golden eagle—a rare bird in New England—which was captured in a steel trap in Preston in the ignoble business of stealing chickens from Mr. Guile, of that town, a few weeks ago. It had a habit of dropping into Mr. Guile's yard daily and carrying off a hen or a turkey, and it had got away with about a dozen of his fowls before the steel trap fastened to its legs. It is a much bigger and an immensely stronger bird than the bald eagle, with a great spread of pinions that could easily carry away a full-grown turkey or a lamb. Mr. Guile has no doubt that it could have flown away with a baby if it had been fond of country babies in the rough.—Norwich (Conn.) Let'er.

HOW TO SLEEP WELL.

A Plan Which Should Be Tried by All Victims of Insomnia.

Take exercise. Get out of doors if possible and walk before bed-time till you are physically weary. Give your hips, legs, feet and toes something to do. Let them know that one of the uses they are for is to call the blood down from your overworked brain and pumping heart, into your flabby extremities till the upper machinery can be relieved of some of the pressure you have forced upon it, and then turn in and have some rest.

If you keep the hot, feverish blood jumping and boiling through blood vessels in the head, as you would keep a fire under a tea-kettle you wished to cool off, how can you expect to settle down to a slow rate and enjoy blessed, refreshing sleep. Idiots sleep well, but fools who refuse to give their brain a rest, have lots of fun keeping awake and thus letting the dog-fight go on.

Work less and accomplish more. Do not give your stomach all it will hold and thus keep the boy on the hay mow working all night with his fork to throw back what you have pitched up, or into him. Do not go home mad, and then sit and read, read, read, till your brain does not know whether it is a human brain or a junk wagon into which every thing is slung.

Romp with the children. Play with them. Play checkers, bean bag, fox and geese, or some other game with your wife or some one else.

Never undertake to study at night. Never permit your children to study after sundown, as to do so is to bring on headaches, backaches and heartaches. You can rest assured that you can not fool Nature or put her in a good nature by insulting her, outraging her, finding fault with her, making her drunk, or keeping her up nights and taking in freight, when she wants to get her harness off and enjoy a few hours' vacation.

Do not try to finish all your work today. This was never yet accomplished and never will be, though millions of candidates have been called out of the convention for attempting so senseless a thing.

So long as life here on earth is the going to your own funeral, don't be in a hurry unless it rains. The slower you travel the greater distance you will journey, the more you will see, the more fun you will have and the more there will be of you when you get there.

MISCHIEF-MAKERS.

Indifferent to Their Tales and You Will Soon Be Rid of Them.

Trouble-makers flourish in all classes and conditions of society. Their chief business in life seems to be the creation of discord among people or members of a family who, but for their interference, would be in harmony. It doesn't take much to start them in business. A thoughtless word, inadvertently dropped, is all they require to put at variance a whole neighborhood. They never repeat a thing exactly as they hear it; they are always sure to add something to it, if not in words in inflection, so there will be no mistake made in understanding just what they mean you should. For fear you might be in doubt they are always eager to explain just what they are positive the person meant who uttered it. To be sure they do not intend to make trouble. They wouldn't make trouble for the world. They really don't like to repeat such things, and they do hope you won't feel hurt, but they think it is only right that you should know just what people say, so as to be on your guard. Only they are your friends, they say they wouldn't think of telling you. These people have a very vague idea of what constitutes a friend. Friends never wilfully hurt the object of their friendship by carrying mischievous stories. Only on rare occasions will they repeat any remark heard, in reference to their friends, to the person upon whom it was passed, and when they do so there are always good reasons that they should. They never repeat a remark simply for the sake of showing you that other people don't think as much of you as you seem to think they do, which is the usual motive of the trouble makers. Friends usually work under the good old adage, "What you don't hear will never hurt you," and this is, certainly, one of the most sensible rules known for any one to live up to.

Some one makes a thoughtless remark about some one not present, very often in a joke, and were the person there at the time the remark would, very probably, have been made just the same, and passed over as a joke by all present, the object of it enjoying it as much as any one. But when the person referred to is not present then comes the opportunity for the trouble-maker. She soon finds time to run to Mrs. C——'s, to tell her what was said about her at Mrs. B——'s the last time she was there, usually adding something to the remark passed on her own account. Mrs. C——, indignant and hurt, very often, in the heat of the moment, says something that ten minutes later she would give any thing if she had not uttered. This is the trouble-maker's chance, and she does not hesitate long in improving it. Hurrying to Mrs. B——, she repeats what Mrs. C—— said, at the same time withholding from her the provocation that brought out the angry words, and adding to this something of her own coining to make it apply closer. It does not take many of these visits to make these two women the bitterest of enemies. They meet on the street and pass each other with scarcely a look of recognition. Neither of them has openly said to the other any thing that would cause things to be in this state. Each one feels as though she, alone, were the injured party, and the other had willfully wronged her. Both were excellent friends until the trouble-maker came between them, and, with her stories and insinuations, gave each the impression that the other was her greatest enemy. When this result is reached the trouble-maker is satisfied to let them get along as best they can, and turns her attention to the severance of some other friends.

The above woman is bad enough in her way, and creates a great deal more trouble than is ever remedied, but when she is once known, people who have had any dealings with her are careful not to give her a chance to again work mischief among their friends. There is another kind of woman who is really more dangerous than the above, and creates more mischief, though perfectly oblivious, at the time, of doing so. She is the thoughtless woman who repeats every thing she hears, simply for the sake of talking. She is perfectly honest and open, and never intends hurting anybody. She wants to be on the best terms with everybody, and she usually is. She always feels grieved when any words of hers have caused trouble, and always winds up her regret with: "I declare, I shan't repeat another thing, for my tongue always runs away with me. I just feel like biting it out." This resolution doesn't last long, and in a little while she has done more mischief with her thoughtless remarks, and so she continues and will continue, for it is as natural for her to talk as it is for her to eat. A woman of this kind is hard to match. She is so perfectly free from any intention of creating trouble, that a person is apt to be careless in what they say before her, even though she may have unintentionally made trouble many a time.

It is too bad that such women as these should come between either friends or relatives with stories to separate them. Whether intentionally told or thoughtlessly told, unless the relater is trustworthy, they should never for a moment be given a thought. Treat them all with an utter indifference, and they will very soon die out. When the professional trouble-maker finds you are indifferent to her tales she will soon cease to visit you, for as far as you are concerned, her occupation will be gone.—Boston Budget.

—Starfish have done great damage this year to the oyster-beds of Fair Haven, Conn. Some entire beds, valued at $20,000 each, have been destroyed, and it is estimated that $300,000 worth of damage has been done. To meet the undoubted demand for something to destroy the starfish, a Yankee has invented a dredge which takes the starfish and leaves the oysters, and several owners of beds are using it.

—Magnesium, the metal which produces such an intensely bright light while burning, and which has been most generally used in ribbon-shaped strips, is now being made use of for the purposes of instantaneous photography. For this a magnesium powder is now manufactured, which, when ignited by the electric spark, makes a brilliant and instantaneous flash. The subject having been posed and the camera arranged, the powder is ignited, and an instantaneous photograph is the result.

—The age of a cow has much to do with her value as a milker. A cow with her first calf never milks as well as with her third or fourth one, and for a dairy animal, as a rule, is unprofitable. For this reason care should be taken in buying cows for the dairy, to obtain those with their second or third calves, not with the first one.

—Tongue Cheese: Take one beef tongue, two calves' livers, three pounds of salt pork, and boil until thoroughly cooked. Mince together very fine, season to taste with spices, press the mass into a pan and allow to get cold. Slice thin and serve upon a napkin in a lunch dish.

—Pocket for Crochet Needles: This is a very useful and ornamental pocket to hang on the wall or inside a large work basket. It is made on a foundation of cardboard. Cut the back six inches long and two and a half inches wide and shape the top any design you like. Make the front three inches long and three and a half wide. Cover the card with blue satin, bind with narrow ribbon, sewing on a gold bead for each stitch in the front of the binding. A row of gold beads is placed on the front about one inch from the edge all round. Sew the front to the back and ornament with bows of pale blue and coral-pink ribbon.

CURE FOR COLD FEET.

Some Medical Advice Furnished by a Genuine Buffalo Humorist.

After long and careful research in hitherto unexplored fields of medical science, and moved by a spirit of genuine philanthropy, we herewith submit to suffering humanity the following remedies for cold feet.

With the understanding that you are a cold-feet martyr, place a piece of rough sand paper inside your stockings and sprinkle freely with red pepper. You will find this the nicest warming-pan you ever saw.

If after wearing the stockings, or rather the sand paper, a couple of weeks, your feet are still cold and pulseless, place the flat of them against the backbone of a sleeping friend and, as he begins to feel his spinal thermometer running down towards zero, he will, if he is a responsive soul, grab you by the hair of the head and attempt to twist your head off.

Four or five twists, properly twisted, will cause the blood to circulate and your feet will warm up accordingly. Dose, one twist every second. A cure guaranteed.

We said we would guarantee a cure. We meant in all but extreme cases, or cases of extremities—cold extremities.

There may be, now and then, an unfortunate who has tried the above-described exhilarating process with little or no success.

The backbone generator may have refused to work, or it may have worked too freely.

The probability is, however, the patient is suffering from what we shall here be pleased to term pedal paralysis, or chronic encrustation of the feet, and in that event the feet must be dipped in hot water, not too suddenly or too frequently, so as to surprise the feet, but gradually, say every fortnight, till they become accustomed to their novel surroundings; then every week, and ultimately daily.

The patient may deem this mode of treatment horribly severe, almost barbaric, but let him remember it is the last resort.

Nothing will cure pedal paralysis, or chronic encrustation of the feet, but water.

If the patient shrinks with loathing at these brilliant suggestions and refuses to employ a little water semi-occasionally he may expect to stub along through life with a couple of poor, miserable non-conductors, an object of no special interest to his friends and a burning reproach to himself.—Drift.

CHIPS FROM CHINA.

How the Celestials Treat Their Gods When They Send Too Much Rain.

Bret Harte is chiefly responsible for the American belief that the Chinese are peculiar for ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, but that they are peculiar all travelers agree. It may be that they are right in their ways and we are wrong, but that is a matter of opinion. For instance, can any one tell why the Chinese wear cotton-cloth shoes? They are not more comfortable than leather nor cheaper, nor as healthful. They cling to their old shoes because they have always worn them, and because they always stay indoors when it rains. A Chinaman dreads water more than fire, and a steady stream of cold water, delivered from a two-inch nozzle, would disperse the most violent mob in China in five minutes' time. Rain will ruin his cotton shoes and soak his cotton clothes, and therefore the Chinaman goes indoors, and stays there until the rain ceases.

The Chinese are very practical in their religious ideas. If a god whose business it is to bring rain overdoes it and causes a deluge, they take him out of the Joss-house and set him down in the shower. If this fails to make him dry up, they go to the extremity of towing him behind a boat in the river to convince him that too much of a good thing is as bad as too little.

In China, artificial oyster culture is largely practiced. Bamboo oyster-fields are constructed by attaching old shells to poles which are planted on mud-flats between high and low water mark, but subject to strong tidal currents. The oyster spat adheres to the shells and soon develops into tiny oysters. Then the bamboos are transplanted. In six months they are found to be covered with well-grown bivalves, which are then marketable.—Golden Days.

A CURIOUS DISCOVERY.

The Sensation Created by a Japanese Peasant Woman.

A young Japanese peasant woman has created a genuine sensation in the medical circles of the east with a new theory and cure for rheumatism.

Her theory is that it is caused by a small insect under the skin, that gnaws and bites the muscles and thus causes the twinges of pain and the untold misery of that ailment.

A grizzled and skeptical sea captain placed himself under her care and, after foot baths of bran and hot rice brandy, she nipped from his knees small white insects by the dozen.

The regular practitioners were skeptical about this new theory, and put one of the insects under a microscope. They decided that by its organism it never could have lived under the surface of the skin.

The Captain insists, however, that the Japanese woman has taken the insects from his knees and ankles by the hundreds, in his sight, and killed them, and that he grows better after each treatment!

This theory, absurd as it seems, is really not much more so than the theories formerly held by the medical fraternity. It used to be thought a trouble of the joints, and was treated as such until it was demonstrated that the treatment brought no lasting results.

Then, as the muscles were affected, it was set down as a muscular disease; but the same unsatisfactory results followed. Now it is universally acknowledged to be a "fiery condition of the blood caused by the presence of uric acid in the system."

To cure it the uric acid must be driven out of the blood, which is done by putting the kidneys in a healthy condition with Warner's safe cure, and "putting out the fire in the blood" by Warner's safe rheumatic cure. These remedies, taken in alternation, as they should be, drive out the uric acid already in the blood, and prevent further accumulation. James Wight, of 37 E. 19th St., New York, was for many years a victim of rheumatism, and tried various remedies and cures without avail. Sept. 8, 1887, he writes in praise of the remedies named, and says: "I am now free from the arrow stings of the dreaded inflammatory rheumatism. I have and always will recommend Warner's rheumatic remedies to all sufferers of the disease."

The Japanese peasant woman's theory will not be likely to stand the test of time and scientific investigation, but the thousands of cures made by the remedies mentioned above prove their merit beyond all question.

A Fair Dream of Women.

Tennyson, in his exquisite poem, dreams of a long procession of lovely women of ages past. This is all very well, but the laureate would have done the world a greater service if he had only told the women of the present how they could improve their health and enhance their charms. This he might easily have done by recommending the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Health is the best friend of beauty, and the innumerable ills to which women are peculiarly subject, its worst enemies. Long experience has proven that the health of woman-kind and the "Favorite Prescription" walk hand in hand, and are inseparable. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Leave hope behind,
All ye who enter here!

So ran the fire warning which Dante read on the portals of the Inferno. So runs the cruel verdict of your friends if you are overtaken by the first symptoms of that terrible disease, consumption. "Leave hope behind! Your days are numbered!!" And the struggle against death is given up in despair. But while there is life, there is hope! Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured hundreds of cases worse than yours; and it will cure you, if taken in time. But delay is dangerous. No power can restore a wasted lung; the "Golden Medical Discovery," however, can and will arrest the disease.

A Great Chance.

If you wish a beautiful picture, that can not be distinguished from a water color worth a large amount of money, you should get Demorest's Monthly Magazine for February. It is simply wonderful how such an elegant picture can be furnished in a magazine that only costs twenty cents. THE ONLY GUARANTEED CURE FOR WOMEN.

[COPYRIGHT, 1887.]

The only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded, is DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

THE OUTGROWTH OF A VAST EXPERIENCE.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

A BOON TO WOMEN. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect specific for woman's peculiar diseases.

A POWERFUL TONIC. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the uterus, or womb and its appendages, in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic. It promotes digestion and assimilation of food, cures nausea, weakness of stomach, indigestion, bloating and eructations of gas.

A SOOTHING NERVINE. As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

A MOTHER'S CORDIAL. In pregnancy, "Favorite Prescription" is a "mother's cordial," relieving nausea, weakness of stomach and other distressing symptoms common to that condition. If its use is kept up in the latter months of gestation, it so prepares the system for delivery as to greatly lessen, and many times almost entirely do away with the sufferings of that trying ordeal.

CURES THE WORST CASES. "Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, or "whites," excessive flowing at monthly periods, painful menstruation, unnatural suppression, prolapsus or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation, and ulceration of the womb, pain and inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

FOR THE KIDNEYS. "Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

TREATING THE WRONG DISEASE.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion, or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent, or over-busy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his practice until large bills are made. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION, directed to the cause, would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

3 PHYSICIANS FAILED. Mrs. E. F. MORGAN, of No. 71 Lexington St., East Boston, Mass., says: "Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room alone. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and using the local treatment recommended in his 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' I commenced to improve at once. In three months I was perfectly cured, and have had no trouble since. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them, and enclosing a stamped envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply, I have described my case and the treatment used, and have earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks, stating that they had commenced the use of 'Favorite Prescription,' had sent the $1.50 required for the 'Medical Adviser,' and had applied the local treatment so fully and plainly laid down therein, and were much better already."

A VOICE FROM CALIFORNIA. Mrs. ED. M. CAMPBELL, of Oakland, California, writes: "I had been troubled all my life with hysterical attacks and paroxysms, or spasms, and periodical recurrences of severe headache, but since I have been using your 'Favorite Prescription' I have had none of these. I also had womb complaint so bad that I could not walk two blocks without the most severe pain, but before I had taken your 'Favorite Prescription' two months, I could walk all over the city without inconvenience. All my troubles seem to be leaving me under the benign influence of your medicine, and I now feel smarter than for years before. My physicians told me that I could not be cured, and therefore you will please accept my everlasting thanks for what you have done for me, and may God bless you in your good works."

Later, she writes: "It is now four years since I took your 'Favorite Prescription,' and I have had no return of the female trouble I had then."

Well as I Ever Was.—Mrs. JOHN STEWART, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., writes: "I wish to inform you that I am as well as I ever was, for which I thank your medicines. I took four bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of your 'Discovery' and four bottles of the 'Pellets.' All of the bad symptoms have disappeared. I do all my own work; am able to be on my feet all day. My friends tell me I never looked so well."

"Favorite Prescription" is Sold by Druggists the World Over! Large Bottles $1.00, Six for $5.00.

Send ten cents in stamps for Dr. Pierce's large, illustrated Treatise (160 pages, paper covers) on Diseases of Women.

Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, No. 663 Main Street, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Retroverted Womb.—Mrs. EVA KOHLER, of Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: "Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done me a great deal of good. I suffered from retroversion of the uterus, for which I took two bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription,' and I am now feeling like a different woman."

Doctors Failed.—Mrs. F. CORWIN, of Post Creek, N. Y., writes: "I doctored with three or four of the best doctors in these parts, and I grew worse until I wrote to you and began using your 'Favorite Prescription.' I used three bottles of it and two of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also one and a half bottles of the 'Pursative Pellets.' I can do my work and sew and walk all I care to, and am in better health than I ever expected to be in this world again. I owe it all to your wonderful medicines."

SATURDAY, JAN. 28, 1888.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union is securing signers to a petetion praying the removal of the internal revenue tax on whiskey.

Additional names of victims of the late storm are received each day, and the number so far known to have perished is 237. South Dakota shows the longest list, North Dakota being apparently outside of the storm belt. and the number of fatalities there being comparatively few. What will be revealed by the melting of the snow no one can tell.

The estimates, as made at Yanktown of the loss of life throughout the Territory of Dakota by the blizzard figure up over 1,000. The counties where the casualities were the largest are: Bonhomme, 100; Hutchinson, 14; Lincoln, 13; Beadle, 25; Spink, 12; Hand, 10; Ward, 15. The northern and central parts of the Territory have not been heard from fully.

Legislature Notes.

In the House a bill has been introduced to reimburse Garrett county for an installment of the State school tax withheld in 1887, and authorizes the comptroller to apportion the installment known as the April installment for 1888, being the apportionment made to that county on the 15th of March in each year. Delegate Friend, who introduced the bill, explained that Garrett county was not asking for an appropriation, but the apportionment that was already due the county. Garrett county, he said had paid her proportion of the State school tax into the State treasury, and was entitled to her share of the school fund. The county, he said, was poor on account of having built her courthouse, jail and new school buildings had become involved, and was unable to keep her schools open seven and a-half months, as required by law.

Rev, Dr. Charles Baldwin, of Washington, and Rev, John M. Davis, of Oakland, were at Annapolis Friday of last week, in the interest of the Mountain Lake Park Association, of Garrett county, of which Mr. Davis is the Superintendent. Two bills were given in charge of Senator Browning. One of them provides for municipal incorporation of the town of Mountain Lake Park, and to exempt certain property from taxation on the ground that it is used for religious purposes; the other amends the charter of the association so as to change the time for election of Stockholders from September to July.

Senator Browning was robbed of his twenty-five dollars' worth of postage stamps during the weekly recess.

From the information at hand the bills before the Legislature affecting this county, in addition to those already noted are as follows:

To appoint a county treasurer. By whom the appointment is to be made we are not informed, but take it as a matter of course that it will be by the Governor, which is the only way to insure the appointment of a Democrat.

To provide for the appointment of school commissioners by the Governor. The bills to reduce the fees of sheriff and State's Attorney will have passed both houses by the time this paper is issued. We do not know the provisions of these bills, nor of the bills in relation to the compensation of Surveyor and Court Crier.

There is a regular stampede of Georgia colored people in the direction of Athens, Atlanta and other cities where the free school system prevails. Many farmers are being deserted by every hand, and one farmer in Oglethorne county, who runs forty plows, has not a colored hand to-day on his farm, the last one having left for Athens. Whole neighborhoods have been deserted by the blacks, and every shanty in the corporate limits of Athens swarms with half-starved colored people. There is nothing in Athens for them to do, there being more men than there is work or room for. The farmers say that they would not listen to propositions looking to contracts for another year, but intend all to move to towns where their children can be sent to school the year round without any money.

JANUARY 20th, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—The public mind has been consiberably exercised for sometime past, upon the tariff and revenue questions, no doubt quickened by the President's late message, which, by a large class of practical and thinking people, is belived to be in the interest of free-trade, so known. True the message is very general and theoretrical in its statements and void of direct recommendations or even suggestions as to how and where revenue reform should be applied. We have not been told what imported articles bearing duties should be put on the free list, or the customs thereon reduced, but that there is too much revenue that needs reduction by taking off or reducing tariff rates. The message on account of its free-trade theories has a more general approval in England and France than at home,

The old theory—it is not an argument—was, and still is, that impost duties on foreign articles imported into this country is a tax paid by the consumer. This is plausible, but not true in fact or argument. If it were true we should now have very high sugar, as according to the Secretary of the Treasury's report, we are paying a tariff rate of 78 per cent. on all the sugar and molasses we consume from abroad except that which comes from the Sandwich Islands free under a reciprocity treaty. $50,800,000 were paid into the Treasury last year on those two articles of necessity, yet sugar was never cheaper, notwithstanding it has born a war tariff for over 25 years. Coffee and tea were on the free list when the late war came on, but they were made to pay a heavy duty as a war measure in 1861. In 1872 they were put on the free list and the revenue reduced about $20,000,000 annually, but the consumers did not get any benefit. The consumers of coffee and tea still pay the old war price. Just here let it be remarked, if the revenue reformers really believe we have an injurious surplus, and that the consumers pay the tariff rate or tax on the imported articles, why not at once strike off the $58,000,000 duty on sugar and molasses, and thereby bring sugar down to 3 or 4 cets per pound to the millions of consumers? But we hear little or nothing from the reformers about free sugar. They are willing to see it severely protected to benefit the few producers in Louisiana, of about $9,000,000 worth of the article.

The free-traders in their scholastic theories and visions endeavor to have practical people believe that by reducing the duties on imported articles made abroad, and liberalizing our tariff laws we will increase the demand abroad for our vast surplus products, especially agricultural. I readily admit that Congress can adjust our tariff laws so as to materially increase our imports, but they cannot by the same laws, or any others, materially increase our exports. Our products are bought from us only as needed, and not in deference to or consideration of our revenue laws. Nations as such do not barter or trade with each other in a mercantile manner, but individuals of different nations do hold such relations with each other, just as home people do. The people of England (not the governments) buy our cotton, breadstuffs, and many other indispensible articles because it is their interest to do so. They never think of enquiring what character of tariff laws rest on our statute books. They do not purchase from us sentimentally, but solely for business reasons and purposes. And when we go abroad for articles we cannot produce, such as coffee, tea, sugar and many others, and even luxuries, we do not trouble ourselves about the laws, institutions, or even the form of government of the people where these articles are to be had. We are proud of our institutions nationally, but just as ready to trade with the Turks as the people of old mother England. It is a great deal easier for us to make a market for the product of other countries here, than to make or increase a market for ourselves on the other side of the Atlantic. People can purchase at will as long their means last, but they cannot sell to others without their willingness to purchase. There is nothing truer than our staple products are only purchased abroad to the extent of actual need, and those needs are neither increased or diminished by the character of our tariff laws.

PROTECTION TO INDUSTRIES AND LABORERS.

Protection is no new thing in the history of our Government; it began with the government itself, with Alexander Hamilton as its author. The ends of all just governments are not merely to rule their people, but to protect them as well, though such may be done in somewhat special manner, that general good may ensue. Money subsidies are granted to enterprises by all enlightened governments in the interest of general public good. What else is this but protection? By the act of 1878 our government is obliged to purchase and coin not less than $2,000,000 standard silver dollars per month. Were it not for this protective act of Congress the silver product of this country—over $50,000,000 per year—would be a demonetized metal, and valued accordingly. Here is protection to silver producers, still much of it has to be shipped to India for a market.

Originally the object of a tariff was to protect American manufactures and capital as against superior advantages and capital of the Old World. But it is no longer necessary to protect American capital, as its abundance among us make it a dilligent seeker of remunerative employment. Indeed, very small percentures are now satisfactory for investments. What is needed now in any new adjustment of our tariff laws will be a wholesome discrimination in favor of American or home labor as against cheap foreign labor. Employment, fairly remunerative, for home labor should be the desideratum. There should be no considerable increase in the importations of foreign manufactured articles. Let our own laborers have the privilege of making what they, to some extent at least, consume or use, even though it cost a little more than the foreign article. Regular employment and fair wages to our laboring people, not only enables them but others to buy and pay for what they eat, wear and use. Prices are not caviled at in good times.

The free-traders admit that any material reduction in our tariff schedules will increase importations of foreign goods corrispondingly. For instance the importation of wool in 1883, as the tariff then stood, was $8,000,000, and the duties thereon about $3,000,000. In that year the duty on wool was reduced a few cents on the pound. Result, $18,000,000 worth of wool imported last year with a revenue of $6,000,000 and a slaughter of 5,000,000 American sheep. This act of Congress protected the wool growers of Australia and South America to the extent of $12.000,000, but severely crippled the wool growing interest of this country, without any perceptible benefit to anybody here. A bad exhibit for the theorizers as well as sheep producers. One of the disappointments of the Reformers was an increase instead of a decrease of revenue. Now suppose deluded reformers succeed in having a tariff law passed at the present session of Congress which will add $100,000,000 of manufactured articles to our annual importations. Will not this displace the same amount of home manufactures? Who can deny this, or rather show it is not true. But these protectionists of British and French interests say this is the same old argument. Be it so, but it is no older than common sense, justice and sound reason. A few years ago there was a prolonged strike among the miners of the Frostburg coal region. Finally a number of foreign laborers called "Swedes" were brought to the scene of trouble, to take the place of the old tried home miners. Many men lost their places and living by these new comers. Now here was a palpable instance where foreign laborers usurped the places of home laborers. This was what teachers call "object teaching"—very plain. Now what is the difference between this case and another where the product of foreign labor in Europe is brought here and dumped among us. Don't American laborers lose their employment to that extent? It is even worse and harder, as all foreign goods contain not only foreign labor but foreign raw material and food articles. Labor is only a part of the cost of such articles. But it is said every American ought to have the right to buy cheap articles, though they be foreign. No. If it be for general good that American articles should be something higher in price than the foreign, let us choose the former. Idle laborers make bad times for us all. Another way to protect home labor would be to restrict the importation of cheap, crude and demoralizing foreign labor. It seems to me established laborers of this country, whether native or adopted, should be of one opinion on this subject. If it be true, and it seems so, that the true reason why American producers cannot compete with those of Europe, is on account of the very cheap labor on the other side, who can fail to see the temptation on our side of the ocean to bring over such labor, so as to reach the same equal grounds with British, German and French rivals. This has already been done, and there will be much more of it in the future if the protective features of our tariff are destroyed.

The President and the Pope.

The Pope of Rome recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his admission to the priesthood in his church, and the various sovereigns of the civilized world sent him presents, some of great value and some merely significant as a recognition of his position. Some were sent con amore from Catholic potentates, as from Spain and Austria, others simply as so much "taffy," as from Bismarck, Queen Victoria and President Cleveland.

The two latter have been a good deal taken to task on account of their gifts by numbers of Protestants and Protestant newspapers, who allege that inasmuch as the Pope is not a temporal sovereign, although claiming to be one, their gifts were neither respectful to the King of Italy, who claims the Pope for a subject, nor to the prevailing religious sentiment of their own countries. They allege that inasmuch as he is merely the head of a church and occupies a purely ecclesiastical position, that therefore his anniversaries are to be no more recognized than those of the primates of the English or Greek Churches, both of which are rival churches in the sense of claiming to be the original church.

Queen Victoria is accused of trying to propitiate the Pope in favor of her Tory police in Ireland, and President Cleveland is accused of having his renomination and re-election in view.

As for Bismarck, his object is well known. He has been for a good while at work conciliating the Vatican, using the power of the church in and out of the Reichstag to checkmate the Socialists, of whom he has in the last two or three years become decidedly afraid.

The Sultan of Turkey, who is clear outside of any sort of religious sympashy with the Pope, pretty near bankrupted himself in order to send an expensive present expressive of his high consideration. Like Bismarck, he had a well known object in view, which was to secure influence at Vienna and throughout the Catholic provinces of Germany, against his mortal enemy, the Russian bear.

Thus we see that everybody had an axe of some kind to grind. Even Austria and Spain felt that the influence of the Pope is a good spoke in their wheels, and that it pays to put him under a little sense of obligation, inasmuch as there is no knowing when they may be involved in a complication with the other powers. So they like to have a little credit in bank at Rome to check on in a possible day of trouble.

Now so far as our beloved President is concerned, he touched the business somewhat lightly. We suppose he did not feel justified in drawing on the contingent fund of the State department for anything very expensive, nor on the other hand did he care to go down very deep into his own pocket. So he sent to the Pope a handsomely bound and inscribed copy of the Constitution of the United States.

This interesting volume was formally presented to the Pope by Archbishop Ryan a day or two ago, and certainly when our two hundred and fifty pound President read that speech of the Archbishop he must have felt that he had his money back with interest. We presume that he never knew so well before what a good man he is, nor how worthy to sit in his exalted seat.

Of course every rose has its thorn, and now Grover is catching it fresh in sundry resolutions and newspaper articles, all accusing him, in substance, of bending the hinges of his knee that "thrift may follow fawning." The fact that he holds a pew in the most elegat Presbyterian church in Washington, and attends services there with tolerable regularily, counts for littie. He is nevertheless suspected of casting his net into the sea for fishes. Or, in other words, of courting sympathetic support in New York and other large cities.

We feel bound to say for Grover that this is his "first offense," (of the kind,) and that we must not wholly ignore the presence of rivalry with Governor Hill in New York, which is more or less formidable, and that after all, considering the size of his present, he cannot be regarded as smitten with any great personal or ecclesiastical affection for the Pope.

The Pope understands this matter.

The Archbishop has explained it all privately. He has told him that a prominent Republican candidate for the Presidency, who will probably contest the next election with Grover, has an immense following among his friends in the United States, and that therefore this "little anchor to the windward" was really a political necessity on the part of the President.—Wheeling Intelligencer.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23, 1888.—For do-nothingness, the present Congress is a long ways ahead of all its predecessors. The House Committee on commerce have the subject of the Reading railroad now before them. It has been informally discussed, and the fact developed, that about one half the committee are opposed to any Congressional investigation, believing if any is necessary, it is within the province of the Inter-State Commerce Commission to make it. The question will be called up again to-morrow, when a delegation of Knights of Labor who want a Congressional investigation, will endeavor to get a hearing.

Congressional investigations are always popular with a certain class of Congressmen, particularly if the corporations and individuals happen to be wealthy. Impecunious Congressmen want all the opportunity for fat pickings that they can get, and they are sure to make the most of their opportunities. The latest proposed investigation is that provided by Mr. Mason's bill, which proposes to empower a Congressional committee to investigate all the trusts and combines that have been entered into by firms, corporations, and individuals in coal, sugar, mining and kindred subjects. The House Committee on Manufactures has unanimonsly agreed to report this bill favorably and they are expected to do so early this week. Then these impecunious Congressmen will begin to indulge in champagne and terrapin stew, and to ride to and from the Capitol in coupes instead of the plebeian street cars and herdics.

It is said there is a strong lobby with unlimited cash behind them who are here with the express purpose of opposing this bill. If it were not for this lobby it is extremely doubtful whether the investigation would ever have been proposed.

Just why Secretary Vilas, late Postmaster General, should have been willing and apparently anxious to go down a grade in official dignity as he did in accepting the portfolio of the Interior Department, has been quite puzzling to a great many people, The whole matter is explained, however, by the following official order which was made public on Saturday:

"Secretary Vilas has relieved Assistant Secretary Muldrow of the care of supervising land decisions, and in the future he will devote his personal attention to them." Which means in plain English that from this time on, the entire public land system of the United States is to be manipulated in the interest of Cleveland's re-election. Keep your eye on Vilas and his land decisions between now and next November.

The Postoffice Department has issued a circular giving the construction that the Department will put upon the new law concerning the amount of printing or writing that may be placed on the wrappers of second class mail matter. This new law received the President's signature on Saturday.

The anti-Randall Democrats in Congress are wild with joy over the defeat of the Randall candidate for the chairmanship of the Democratic State Central Committee, of Pennsylvania, and the passage by that committee of a resolution strongly endorsing Cleveland and commending his recommendation for reducing the tariff. Mr. Randall keeps cool, and says the result will not change his legislative course one iota; but he does not intimate what that course will be during the present session of of Congress. But it is safe to say that his opinion on the tariff has not undergone any change since the adjournment of the forty-ninth Congress, It is claimed by internal men that Randall is with them in their extremest measures, while others will tell you that he only favors the abolition of the tobacco tax, and still a few, very few, others will tell you that he will favor the bill for reducing the tariff, that will be reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. The fact of the matter is, no one knows what Randall intends doing. He has not committeed himself. His enemies think that his defeat in Pennsylvania will deprive him of some of his prestige and power in the House. We shall see.

Propagating and Protecting Fish.

Fish Commissioners G. W. Delawder and E, W. Humphreys make an elaborate report for the year ended December 31, 1887. They say their principal work is in the propagation of shad, rock, perch and herring though brook trout and German carp are largely hatched and freely distributed throughout the State. Besides Druid Hill Park for trout and locked salmon and carp, three other hatcheries are kept up for the other sorts of fish and located respectively on Tuckahoe river, Caroline county, on the Nanticoke river, and on the Wicomico at Salisbury. The report claims that the work of the Commission is no longer experimental, but a necessity. But for this work the shad would be unknown in our waters. The commissioners think it is surprising that any shad ever reached the spawning grounds, considering the great number of and improved methods of catching them, beginning at the mouth of the bay and continuing to the head thereof, and on every river of the Eastern and Western Shores. They say that in spite of these numerous enemies the numbers of shad have largely increased, as is evidenced by the greater numbers caught every year, and that the numbers of rockfish and perch caught have also largely increased. As for the herring, they have been so numerous that acres of them were stranded on the flats of the Susquehanna, and that it was not profitable to catch them. The commissioners ascribe all this to the work of the fish commission and estimate the product of the fish taken every year in our waters at $1,000,000 annually. Without artificial aid every species of fish that run up the rivers would in a few years disappear entirely. The report complains of the large increase of fish traps, pound nets or fykes, and recommends that the size of meshes in nets should be regulated by law; that the sale of small perch and rockfish should be prohibited in the markets; that all fishing should be prohibited on Saturday sand Sundays of each week during the months of April and May; that more effectivs protection should be adopted for the upper Potomac, where wardens should be appointed to destroy all fish pots and other devices of the sort placed in the river.

Review of Trade.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—R. G. Dun & Co., in their weekly review, say: Business throughout the country is rather quiet, even for the season. Fairly active jobbing trade is reported at several points where wholesale business is distinctly dull, and a prevailing feature seems to be indisposition to take quantities in view of the unusual uncertainties in many markets caused by strikes, by speculation, and by legialative speculation deliberations.

Collections are fairly satisfactory at nearly all points and money generally is in fair supply, though rather close at Denver and Cleveland. Though actual deliveries of anthracites are larger than for the same weeks last year, operators and retailers vie with each other in putting up prices. Poverty of miners causes a serious apprehension among traders, who remember that their losses after the strike of 1875 were three-fourths of their account. But for activity in ship, bridge and car building, the iron trade would be less hopeful. The Thomas Company has sold No, 2 foundary for pipe at $17, and sales of 20,000 tons of rails are reported, but prices do not change. In wool, the little improvement recently seen has vanished and the market favors buyers again. The demand for woolen goods is moderate, but more frequent inquiry gives hope, and the range of prices, is, on the whole, but little below those of last year.

Nearly all the speculative markets have been weak. Stocks weaken in spite of large reported railway earnings and an advance of 10 per cent in east bound rail rates. The Reading strike and reported liquidation of a pool in the stock have caused some decline, and in other stocks the absence of any public demand is felt, The average price is $150 per share lower than a week ago.

Another Blizzard.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Jan. 24.—Another blizzard has broken loose northwest of here. A Neche (Dakota) special to the Pioneer Press, says: The mercury went down to 60 below, and the wind reached a velocity of 40 miles an hour last night. It is still blowing, and trains are ten hours late. Brainerd reports that the storm reached there this morning. A heavy fall of snow has set in, and the wind is blowing a gale. The snow is drifting badly. The Pioneer Press learns from Brown's Valley, Minn., that the fuel there is not only used up, but provisions are also getting low. Should another storm prevent the opening of the road within a few days, great suffering can hardly be avoided, particularly among the farmers along the line.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union is securing signers to a petetion praying the removal of the internal revenue tax on whiskey,

Additional names of victims of the late storm are received each day, and the number so far known to have perished is 237. South Dakota shows the longest list, North Dakota being apparently outside of the storm belt. and the number of fatalities there being comparatively few. What will be revealed by the melting of the snow no one can tell.

The estimates, as made at Yanktown of the loss of life throughout the Territory of Dakota by the blizzard figure up over 1,000. The counties where the casualities were the largest are: Bonhomme, 100; Hutchinson, 14; Lincoln, 13; Beadle, 25; Spink, 12; Hand, 10; Ward, 15. The northern and central parts of the Territory have not been heard from fully.

Legislature Notes.

In the House a bill has been introduced to reimburse Garrett county for an installment of the State school tax withheld in 1887, and authorizes the comptroller to apportion the installment known as the April installment for 1888, being the apportionment made to that county on the 15th of March in each year. Delegate Friend, who introduced the bill, explained that Garrett county was not asking for an appropriation, but the apportionment that was already due the county. Garrett county, he said had paid her proportion of the State school tax into the State treasury, and was entitled to her share of the school fund. The county, he said, was poor on account of having built her courthouse, jail and new school buildings had become involved, and was unable to keep her schools open seven and a-half months, as required by law.

Rev, Dr. Charles Baldwin, of Washington, and Rev. John M. Davis, of Oakland, were at Annapolis Friday of last week, in the interest of the Mountain Lake Park Association, of Garrett county, of which Mr. Davis is the Superintendent. Two bills were given in charge of Senator Browning. One of them provides for municipal incorporation of the town of Mountain Lake Park, and to exempt certain property from taxation on the ground that it is used for religious purposes; the other amends the charter of the association so as to change the time for election of Stockholders from September to July.

Senator Browning was robbed of his twenty-five dollars' worth of postage stamps during the weekly recess.

From the information at hand the bills before the Legislature affecting this county, in addition to those already noted are as follows:

To appoint a county treasurer. By whom the appointment is to be made we are not informed, but take it as a matter of course that it will be by the Governor, which is the only way to insure the appointment of a Democrat.

To provide for the appointment of school commissioners by the Governor. The bills to reduce the fees of sheriff and State's Attorney will have passed both houses by the time this paper is issued. We do not know the provisions of these bills, nor of the bills in relation to the compensation of Surveyor and Court Crier.

There is a regular stampede of Georgia colored people in the direction of Athens, Atlanta and other cities where the free school system prevails. Many farmers are being deserted by every hand, and one farmer in Oglethorne county, who runs forty plows, has not a colored hand to-day on his farm, the last one having left for Athens. Whole neighborhoods have been deserted by the blacks, and every shanty in the corporate limits of Athens swarms with half-starved colored people. There is nothing in Athens for them to do, there being more men than there is work or room for. The farmers say that they would not listen to propositions looking to contracts for another year, but intend all to move to towns where their children can be sent to school the year round without any money.

JANUARY 20th, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—The public mind nas been consiberably exercised for sometime past, upon the tariff and revenue questions, no doubt quickened by the President's late message, which, by a large class of practical and thinking people, is belived to be in the interest of free-trade, so known. True the message is very general and theoretrical in its statements and void of direct recommendations or even suggestions as to how and where revenue reform should be applied. We have not been told what imported articles bearing duties should be put on the free list, or the customs thereon reduced, but that there is too much revenue that needs reduction by taking off or reducing tariff rates. The message on account of its free-trade theories has a more general approval in England and France than at home,

The old theory—it is not an argument—was, and still is, that impost duties on foreign articles imported into this country is a tax paid by the consumer. This is plausible, but not true in fact or argument. If it were true we should now have very high sugar, as according to the Secretary of the Treasury's report, we are paying a tariff rate of 78 per cent. on all the sugar and molasses we consume from abroad except that which comes from the Sandwich Islands free under a reciprocity treaty. $50,800,000 were paid into the Treasury last year on those two articles of necessity, yet sugar was never cheaper, notwithstanding it has born a war tariff for over 25 years. Coffee and tea were on the free list when the late war came on, but they were made to pay a heavy duty as a war measure in 1861. In 1872 they were put on the free list and the revenue reduced about $20,000,000 annually, but the consumers did not get any benefit. The consumers of coffee and tea still pay the old war price. Just here let it be remarked, if the revenue reformers really believe we have an injurious surplus, and that the consumers pay the tariff rate or tax on the imported articles, why not at once strike off the $58,000,000 duty on sugar and molasses, and thereby bring sugar down to 3 or 4 cets per pound to the millions of consumers? But we hear little or nothing from the reformers about free sugar. They are willing to see it severely protected to benefit the few producers in Louisiana, of about $9,000,000 worth of the article.

The free-traders in their scholastic theories and visions endeavor to have practical people believe that by reducing the duties on imported articles made abroad, and liberalizing our tariff laws we will increase the demand abroad for our vast surplus products, especially agricultural. I readily admit that Congress can adjust our tariff laws so as to materially increase our imports, but they cannot by the same laws, or any others, materially increase our exports. Our products are bought from us only as needed, and not in deference to or consideration of our revenue laws. Nations as such do not barter or trade with each other in a mercantile manner, but individuals of different nations do hold such relations with each other, just as home people do. The people of England (not the governments) buy our cotton, breadstuffs, and many other indispensible articles because it is their interest to do so. They never think of enquiring what character of tariff laws rest on our statute books. They do not purchase from us sentimentally, but solely for business reasons and purposes. And when we go abroad for articles we cannot produce, such as coffee, tea, sugar and many others, and even luxuries, we do not trouble ourselves about the laws, institutions, or even the form of government of the people where these articles are to be had. We are proud of our institutions nationally, but just as ready to trade with the Turks as the people of old mother England. It is a great deal easier for us to make a market for the product of other countries here, than to make or increase a market for ourselves on the other side of the Atlantic. People can purchase at will as long their means last, but they cannot sell to others without their willingness to purchase. There is nothing truer than our staple products are only purchased abroad to the extent of actual need, and those needs are neither increased or diminished by the character of our tariff laws.

PROTECTION TO INDUSTRIES AND LABORERS.

Protection is no new thing in the history of our Government; it began with the government itself, with Alexander Hamilton as its author. The ends of all just governments are not merely to rule their people, but to protect them as well, though such may be done in somewhat special manner, that general good may ensue. Money subsidies are granted to enterprises by all enlightened governments in the interest of general public good. What else is this but protection? By the act of 1878 our government is obliged to purchase and coin not less than $2,000,000 standard silver dollars per month. Were it not for this protective act of Congress the silver product of this country—over $50,000,000 per year—would be a demonetized metal, and valued accordingly. Here is protection to silver producers, still much of it has to be shipped to India for a market.

Originally the object of a tariff was to protect American manufactures and capital as against superior advantages and capital of the Old World. But it is no longer necessary to protect American capital, as its abundance among us make it a dilligent seeker of remunerative employment. Indeed, very small percentures are now satisfactory for investments. What is needed now in any new adjustment of our tariff laws will be a wholesome discrimination in favor of American or home labor as against cheap foreign labor. Employment, fairly remunerative, for home labor should be the desideratum. There should be no considerable increase in the importations of foreign manufactured articles. Let our own laborers have the privilege of making what they, to some extent at least, consume or use, even though it cost a little more than the foreign article. Regular employment and fair wages to our laboring people, not only enables them but others to buy and pay for what they eat, wear and use. Prices are not caviled at in good times.

The free-traders admit that any material reduction in our tariff schedules will increase importations of foreign goods corrispondingly. For instance the importation of wool in 1883, as the tariff then stood, was $8,000,000, and the duties thereon about $3,000,000. In that year the duty on wool was reduced a few cents on the pound. Result, $18,000,000 worth of wool imported last year with a revenue of $6,000,000 and a slaughter of 5,000,000 American sheep. This act of Congress protected the wool growers of Australia and South America to the extent of $12.000,000, but severely crippled the wool growing interest of this country, without any perceptible benefit to anybody here. A bad exhibit for the theorizers as well as sheep producers. One of the disappointments of the Reformers was an increase instead of a decrease of revenue. Now suppose deluded reformers succeed in having a tariff law passed at the present session of Congress which will add $100,000,000 of manufactured articles to our annual importations. Will not this displace the same amount of home manufactures? Who can deny this, or rather show it is not true. But these protectionists of British and French interests say this is the same old argument. Be it so, but it is no older than common sense, justice and sound reason. A few years ago there was a prolonged strike among the miners of the Frostburg coal region. Finally a number of foreign laborers called "Swedes" were brought to the scene of trouble, to take the place of the old tried home miners. Many men lost their places and living by these new comers. Now here was a palpable instance where foreign laborers usurped the places of home laborers. This was what teachers call "object teaching"—very plain. Now what is the difference between this case and another where the product of foreign labor in Europe is brought here and dumped among us. Don't American laborers lose their employment to that extent? It is even worse and harder, as all foreign goods contain not only foreign labor but foreign raw material and food articles. Labor is only a part of the cost of such articles. But it is said every American ought to have the right to buy cheap articles, though they be foreign. No. If it be for general good that American articles should be something higher in price than the foreign, let us choose the former. Idle laborers make bad times for us all. Another way to protect home labor would be to restrict the importation of cheap, crude and demoralizing foreign labor. It seems to me established laborers of this country, whether native or adopted, should be of one opinion on this subject. If it be true, and it seems so, that the true reason why American producers cannot compete with those of Europe, is on account of the very cheap labor on the other side, who can fail to see the temptation on our side of the ocean to bring over such labor, so as to reach the same equal grounds with British, German and French rivals. This has already been done, and there will be much more of it in the future if the protective features of our tariff are destroyed.

Which means in plain English that from this time on, the entire public land system of the United States is to be manipulated in the interest of Cleveland's re-election. Keep your eye on Vilas and his land decisions between now and next November.

The Postoffice Department has issued a circular giving the construction that the Department will put upon the new law concerning the amount of printing or writing that may be placed on the wrappers of second class mail matter. This new law received the President's signature on Saturday.

The anti-Randall Democrats in Congress are wild with joy over the defeat of the Randall candidate for the chairmanship of the Democratic State Central Committee, of Pennsylvania, and the passage by that committee of a resolution strongly endorsing Cleveland and commending his recommendation for reducing the tariff. Mr. Randall keeps cool, and says the result will not change his legislative course one iota; but he does not intimate what that course will be during the present session of of Congress. But it is safe to say that his opinion on the tariff has not undergone any change since the adjournment of the forty-ninth Congress, It is claimed by internal men that Randall is with them in their extremest measures, while others will tell you that he only favors the abolition of the tobacco tax, and still a few, very few, others will tell you that he will favor the bill for reducing the tariff, that will be reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. The fact of the matter is, no one knows what Randall intends doing. He has not committeed himself. His enemies think that his defeat in Pennsylvania will deprive him of some of his prestige and power in the House. We shall see.

Propagating and Protecting Fish.

Fish Commissioners G. W. Delawder and E. W. Humphreys make an elaborate report for the year ended December 31, 1887. They say their principal work is in the propagation of shad, rock, perch and herring though brook trout and German carp are largely hatched and freely distributed throughout the State. Besides Druid Hill Park for trout and locked salmon and carp, three other hatcheries are kept up for the other sorts of fish and located respectively on Tuckahoe river, Caroline county, on the Nanticoke river, and on the Wicomico at Salisbury. The report claims that the work of the Commission is no longer experimental, but a necessity. But for this work the shad would be unknown in our waters. The commissioners think it is surprising that any shad ever reached the spawning grounds, considering the great number of and improved methods of catching them, beginning at the mouth of the bay and continuing to the head thereof, and on every river of the Eastern and Western Shores. They say that in spite of these numerous enemies the numbers of shad have largely increased, as is evidenced by the greater numbers caught every year, and that the numbers of rockfish and perch caught have also largely increased. As for the herring, they have been so numerous that acres of them were stranded on the flats of the Susquehanna, and that it was not profitable to catch them. The commissioners ascribe all this to the work of the fish commission and estimate the product of the fish taken every year in our waters at $1,000,000 annually. Without artificial aid every species of fish that run up the rivers would in a few years disappear entirely. The report complains of the large increase of fish traps, pound nets or fykes, and recommends that the size of meshes in nets should be regulated by law; that the sale of small perch and rockfish should be prohibited in the markets; that all fishing should be prohibited on Saturday sand Sundays of each week during the months of April and May; that more effectivs protection should be adopted for the upper Potomac, where wardens should be appointed to destroy all fish pots and other devices of the sort placed in the river.

Review of Trade.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—R. G. Dun & Co., in their weekly review, say: Business throughout the country is rather quiet, even for the season. Fairly active jobbing trade is reported at several points where wholesale business is distinctly dull, and a prevailing feature seems to be indisposition to take quantities in view of the unusual uncertainties in many markets caused by strikes, by speculation, and by legialative speculation deliberations.

Collections are fairly satisfactory at nearly all points and money generally is in fair supply, though rather close at Denver and Cleveland. Though actual deliveries of anthracites are larger than for the same weeks last year, operators and retailers vie with each other in putting up prices. Poverty of miners causes a serious apprehension among traders, who remember that their losses after the strike of 1875 were three-fourths of their account. But for activity in ship, bridge and car building, the iron trade would be less hopeful. The Thomas Company has sold No, 2 foundary for pipe at $17, and sales of 20,000 tons of rails are reported, but prices do not change. In wool, the little improvement recently seen has vanished and the market favors buyers again. The demand for woolen goods is moderate, but more frequent inquiry gives hope, and the range of prices, is, on the whole, but little below those of last year.

Nearly all the speculative markets have been weak. Stocks weaken in spite of large reported railway earnings and an advance of 10 per cent in east bound rail rates. The Reading strike and reported liquidation of a pool in the stock have caused some decline, and in other stocks the absence of any public demand is felt, The average price is $150 per share lower than a week ago.

Another Blizzard.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Jan. 24.—Another blizzard has broken loose northwest of here. A Neche (Dakota) special to the Pioneer Press, says: The mercury went down to 60 below, and the wind reached a velocity of 40 miles an hour last night. It is still blowing, and trains are ten hours late. Brainerd reports that the storm reached there this morning. A heavy fall of snow has set in, and the wind is blowing a gale. The snow is drifting badly. The Pioneer Press learns from Brown's Valley, Minn., that the fuel there is not only used up, but provisions are also getting low. Should another storm prevent the opening of the road within a few days, great suffering can hardly be avoided, particularly among the farmers along the line.

Removal.

Having removed our stock to the building lately occupied by J. A. Grant, we will be pleased to see all our old customers and as many new faces as possible. Call and see us in our new quarters. We will try and make it pleasant for you, and at the same time make you feel as though you received the worth of your money. To our old customers on the hill we would say, if they will still continue their patronage their kindness will be greatly appreciated, and we will at the same time try and remunerate them for the extra walk.

Respectfully,
O. HART & SON.

New Year Party.

Thursday evening, Jan. 19th, the members of the Young Girls' Christian Friendly Society, of Deer Park, gave a very enjoyable entertainment to their young friends, in Mrs. Dr. Laughlin's spacious parlor, "Mountain Home," their new building next door not being yet ready for their reception. Almost fifty young persons were present, the members of the society being nearly half that number, and including young ladies of Deer Park and vicinity, of whom Misses Georgie Hoye, Ella Laughlin and Clara Freeland constituted a committee of arrangement, with the assistance of Mrs. L. H. Schoolfield and Mrs. F. S. Thrasher as associates. Though the wind was keen without in the bright, beautiful moonlight, and the snow and ice covered the mountains around with a matchless mantel, worthy of winter, a warm welcome awaited the merry young people as they gathered to receive the greetings of their fair friends within and enjoying their kind hospitality.

After the arrival of the guests Mr. Wm. D. Hoye, of Deer Park, on behalf of the young ladies of the society, delivered a very appropriate and cordial address of welcome to the visitors, stating that the object of the occasion was an evening's enjoyment of friendly intercourse and refinement, free from frivolity and the baleful influences of the ball-room and other objectionable features.

Mr. H. H. Van Meter, in responding, thanked the young ladies and their friends, on behalf of their guests present, for their kind invitation extended to them, and the exceedingly pleasant welcome with which they were greeted to the good cheer which awaited their happy gathering, and hoped that it might give their bright eyed entertainers as great pleasure as it did their guests.

The programme which followed was well arranged and full of interest and enjoyment, enlivened by charades, music and conversation till late in the evening, when the young ladies treated their guests to delicious ice cream and cake, which attested to their skill in the arts which make a happy home.

At the close it was announced that the society would hold an oyster supper on the evenings of Thursday and Friday, Feb. 23d and 24th, in the dining-room of the Wing-and-Wing, for the benefit of the charitable fund.

In concluding this report it might be well to explain briefly the character and workings of the Society.

The Y. G. C. F. S. was started by Mrs. J. W. Williams, of Philadelphia, in November, 1886, with only three members at the first meeting. In less than a month the number had increased to 19. Thirty have been admitted to membership, and there are 23 names on the roll now. The meetings are held weekly, where instructions are given in various kinds of fancy as well as more useful work. They have a library of from 70 to 80 volumes of most excellent books, and also a fine stereoptican, which is used for exhibitions for the benefit of the public in general, some of the members exhibiting and describing the views, all of which were presented by Mrs. Williams, who is erecting a memorial building for the benefit of the Society, which is to be opened in the spring.

The officers of the Society are Mrs. J. W. Williams, of Philadelphia, its projector and patron, President, and her daughter, Miss Annie Williams, of Philadelphia, Mrs. F. S. Thrasher and L. H. Schoolfield, of Deer Park, Associates, all of whom are deserving of the highest praise and truest gratitude of the community for the noble labor of love.

Would it not be well for every neighborhood to have such an organization for the good of the girls who are growing up among us to become the wives and mothers of the future, and to wield an influence for weal or woe which will form the future of our county. Let the christian fathers and mothers of our land do all in their power to foster the purity such societies seek to promote. No greater good can they accomplish.

Mr. Nicholas Merrill on Fruit Culture.

Some important facts in answer to our queries:

Mr. Merrill, we understand you have bought the trees for several acres more of an orchard; do you think it will pay?

Pay, it can't help but pay. A ten year old apple tree, well cared for, will average five bushels, which, at fifty cents, means one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars off of ten acres. Now, Mr. Hayden, is there a farm in Garrett county of one hundred acres which yields that sum? Besides, other fruits, though more trouble to raise, generally pay still better than apples, Winter pears, for example, bring four to six dollars per bushel, and pears do well in Garrett county. Mr. Sweet, who has traveled extensively, selected this section for late fruits in preference to Michigan, New York and Tennessee and is putting out 1,000 apples and thes ame of pairs, besides as much more of other sorts of fruit.

But, Mr. Merrill, if all go to setting, will it not lower the price?

No danger of that for statistics show that city people now only get about four apples apiece each year, and it is plain we have but just begun to ship apples to Europe. As soon as we have enough fruit to bring them here, the buyers will be competing for our crop, even on the tree.

But you have to wait ten years before any returns.

Not if you properly set and care for your trees; however, this waiting is just why all will not go into it, and why it will always be profitable. The doctor looks down your throat and charges you a dollar. The poor man is glad to work hard a whole day for that much. "Why is this?" for the same reason that fruit growing is more profitable than to grow buckwheat. Because money and effort are unremunerated for several years. The multitude want quick returns and glut the market with their labor and their crops; the few manage to wait and in the end reap a rich reward.

You have been branding some of the fruit agents as rascals; I wonder you found any one you could trust.

Oh, I have had my eyes open for honest men as well as rascals, and this same Mr. Sweet, who is setting the largest orchard in the county, is starting a small nursery. To meet the expense of all this he has had to sell trees, and, from all I can learn, has been furnishing the lower part of the county the best stock they have ever seen, and at reasonable rates. He gets his stock from a nursery endorsed by the head of the National Grange, and as every dollar he gets goes to building up a home industry for which Garrett county was made and especially set apart from the foundation of the world, he is my man.

Well, Nicholas, you seem to have the floor, so let's shake and call it square, but don't forget the editor's sanctum when the trees begin to bear.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Jan. 23, 1888.

ED. REPUBLICAN:—I have received many letters from youug men in Garrett county asking me to get them employment here, which I would be delighted to do, but they will not measure up to two of the leading requirements, namely: business experience and city acquaintance. There are always here hundreds awaiting employment in business houses, who understand business and have a thorough acquaintance in the city and its many suburban towns. The only thing for a young man to do, if he is determined to come to the city, is to take anythig that he can get and work up by degrees.

CHAS. F. FRAZEE.

Franklin Mines.

Work at the mines has slacked off.

Hon. Geo. T. Michael is the proudest man in Garrett county. He says his name shall be Grover Cleveland Michael.

Mr. John Laughlin, father of Daniel Laughlin, who has been suffering with a nervous affection for two years past, has been very bad for a couple of weeks, but we are glad to state is now somewhat improved.

The Firm Rock school is flourishing, with Miss McAndrews and Miss Allen as teachers. Miss Bridget McAndrews is one of Garrett county's most efficient teachers, and the trustees did well in securing her services.

Mr. Thomas D. Michaels has erected a saw mill on the Brady place, with Mr. Thornt. Sliger as sawyer. He is sawing lumber for use principally at the mines.

Everybody is pleased with our new constable. I am sure he will prove an efficient officer.

The weather is desperate cold and slippery, making travel almost impossible.

REMUS.

Laurel Run.

Plenty of sledding here now.

Our farmers are all busy hauling limestone and coal.

Mr. C. J. Otto is shipping quite a nice lot of lumber to Frostburg this winter.

Some of our friends who have had the Western fever for sometime have got partly out of the notion since they read the reports of the western storms.

Cleaning Out of Winter Styles.

We are now offering our Millinery goods at a great loss, but they must go. Ladies' Felt Hats, formerly $100 now 50c, Feathers half-price, Tobogganns and Hoods half-price, Cloaks way down, splendid 5-Hook Corset 35c., Dr. Warner's Caroline Corset 85c. Have a few Indian Robes and Blankets yet. They are very desirable.

Col. E. C. Tilson left last week for New Jersey to visit his daughter, Mrs Hoffman. He was accompanied by Mrs. W. R. Davis, of Piedmont, and will visit New York and other eastern cities before his return.

Mrs. E. F. Droege leaves to-day for Baltimore, having received intelligence of the serious illness of her mother, who is over ninety years old.

Mr. B. B. Savage, the principal of our school here, received news on last Thursday that his father, who lives at Sang Run, was very low with pneumonia, and left for his home on the following day. He has not yet returned.

Mrs. D. F. Graham is in Piedmont, on a visit to her parents.

Mrs. A. Freeland fell on the ice one day last week and cut her face very severely, but fortunately escaped any more serious injury.

The Young Girls' Christian Friendly Society, gave a New Year's party to their friends on Thursday, 19th inst. A very pleasant affair.

Mrs. Droege entertained a number of her friends at supper on the same day, and in the afternoon little Nellie Hoye gave a birthday party to some of her juvenile companions.

Miss Jennie Maysilles, daughter of the U. B. Pastor, has been visiting at Mr. P. W. Connell's. —

Hurrah! Everything at Cost!

Just read this, if you please:

I will offer my entire stock of goods at first cost, for the next three months, consisting of one grand piano, manufactured by Chas. M. Steiff, one of the best make in America, my price is low, $150.00, one splendid organ for $55.00, a sweeter toned organ cannot be found, first-class violins from $2.50 up to $8.00, accordeons from 75 cts. up to $5.00, Ladies' and Gent's solid gold watches, from $17.00 up to $75.00, Ladies' and Gent's gold-filled watches, open face or hunting case, $20.00 up to $25.00, the best in the world, with Elgin stem-winding movements, guaranteed for 21 years, 6 oz. silverore watches from $5.00 up to $12.00, solid silver watches as low in proportion. All watches warranted. Splendid 8-day clocks for $3.75, others lower and some higher. Besides all this I have a splendid assortment of all kinds of Jewelry, Silverware, Spectacles, etc., etc. These goods are new and latest styles, but as I have a very large stock on hand, I propose to clear it out and get lots of room for a large stock in the spring. Come and get something good and cheap while you have the chance. I mean business and never advertise anything unless I expect to back it up.

Terms positively cash.

Hoping to be favored with your kind patronage as heretofore.

Booming Kansas.

The champion liar (a Kansas man, of course) gets in his work on Kansas as follows:

It has been discovered that Western Kansas is the Eden from which Grandfather Adam and Grandmoth-Eve were driven for fooling with Goodman's winesaps. The stump of the identical tree under which Mrs. Adam was beguiled is just south of the river in Hamilton county. The flaming sword that guarded the tree of life has been stolen by the Indians or cow-boys, but the fig tree is there from which Mrs. Eve manufactured her fashionable but somewhat scanty wearing apparrel. It is dead now—probably winter killed—but like our flag, it is still there, and furnishes evidence which the oldest inhabitants dare not dispute. The soil is as fertile as in ye olden time, and produces prodigiously. Sunflowers can be seen that will make a dozen fence-rails and a whole lot of cord wood. Potatoes grow so big that they can only be roasted by building a fire on the windward side and when one section is done, waiting for the wind to change. Cabbage leaves are used for circus tents, and hop poles are made out of timothy stalks. Jack rabbits grow as large as horses, and tail feathers of wild geese make excellent fence posts. The wheat is larger than the corn in most States and it is daugerous to plant rye, as the roots have to be grubbed out before the ground can be plowed. A man planted a turnip one mile from the railroad last summer and the company sued him for obstructing the way before the middle of July. Pie plant makes excellent bridge timbers, and pumpkins are in excellent demand for houses and barns. Pea-pods are used as ferry boats over the Arkansas river, and onion seeds are much sought after for walling wells and terrace work. Rye straw properly connected makes superior drainage and the husks of the berry when provided with rockers, make unique baby cradles. North of Coolridge are several lakes of strained honey, and we have seen showers of rose water and cologne water in the early part of the year. This settling of Western Kansas is restoring Eden to its first estate.

BIG BEN.

His Cruelty to a Helpless Boy and What Came of It.

Were we afraid of Big Ben?

Well, yes, to a certain limit. There were five of us in a bit of cabin out in the silver country, and Big Ben was boss of the ranch for several reasons. First and foremost, he was too much for any one of us single handed, and, secondly he had many good points about him. While he was overbearing and brutal at times, he was the best miner in the party, and no bad luck could discourage him. With any one else as boss we should have scattered at once, for the winter was coming on and we had been down on our luck all the fall.

"Break up! Hunt for luck!" sneered Big Ben whenever any thing was said about abandoning our claim. "Well, you are a lot of coyotes—a cussed bad lot. You haven't got the pluck of a sick wolk. I'd like to see some of you try to walk off and leave me in the lurch—yes, I would. Curse your eyes! but I'll turn to and lick the hull crowd out of your boots if I hear another growl."

Big Ben insulted us a dozen times a day, and on three or four occasions he laid hands on us in a violent way, but somehow we stuck there. As I told you, he was a practical miner, the hardest worker in the lot, and we leaned on him in spite of the fact that we hated him. We could have shot him down in some of the quarrels, and the verdict would have been: "Served him right;" but we knew that he had a good heart down in his bosom, and the hand which clutched knife or pistol was always restrained.

One afternoon, while I was minding the cabin and the other men were at work in the tunnel or shaft, a stranger entered. He had come up from the Forks, three miles away. He was a boy of sixteen or thereabouts, with a girl's voice and shyness, and he was hungry and in rags. It was bitter cold, and yet his clothing was of the thinnest kind, and he had hungered so long that he was hardly more than a shadow. I welcomed and fed and warmed him, and then he told me that his name was Charley Bland, and that he had wandered out there to look for his brother James, from whom he had received no word for two or three years. They were orphans, and both had been bound to farmers in Illinois. Both had been ill used, and Charley had finally followed James' example in running away. This boy had been knocking around the silver camps for six months, sometimes meeting friends and sometimes treated like a dog, and he had found no trace of his brother. Some one down at the gulch—it was a cruel thing to do—had told him that James was at our camp, and he had periled his life to come up there and see. On that day, as I shall never forget, there was a foot of snow on the ground, a blizzard raging, and the thermometer marked ten degrees below zero.

The boy was asleep when the men returned from the shaft. Big Ben was out of sorts at the way things had been going, and no sooner did he see and hear the lad than he called out:

"He can't stay here another hour. We don't run a poorhouse, and we let no baby-faced swindler eat our hard-earned provisions."

"I'll work. I'll work as hard as ever I can," protested the boy with a sob in his throat.

"There's no work for you. You've got to move on to the camp above."

The four of us protested in chorus, and we took such a firm stand that deadly weapons were drawn, and would have been used but for the action of the boy. He was terribly frightened over the row he had been the innocent cause of, and as the four of us had our pistols leveled at Big Ben and meant to shoot if he moved a foot, the boy opened the cabin door and glided out into the dark and bitter night with the silence and swiftness of a shadow.

"You are his murderer," we said to Big Ben as we lowered our weapons, and he growled:

"Curse him! If we took in every straggler we should be crowded out of house and home before New Year's. What is it to us whether he lives or dies?"

I think he felt conscience-stricken within the hour, however, as he went to the door and acted as if he hoped to see the lad standing outside. The boy had been gone half an hour before we fully realized what his going meant, and then two of us went out with the lantern and searched and called for him. The snow was being whirled about in a furious manner, and the wind was rising to a gale, and the bitter cold drove us back after a quarter of an hour. It was true that we had little enough to eat, and that we were cramped in our cabin, but the idea of driving that pale-faced orphan boy out to freeze was something we could not get over. It was just the thing needed to set us up in rebellion against our boss, and that night we threw off the yoke and gave it to Big Ben right and left. We had two or three rows before bedtime, and all turned in sulky and indignant.

Whew! But what a night that was! The cold increased until the rocks were split, and the wind roared until our cabin threatened to topple over at every blast. At midnight Big Ben crept carefully out of his bed and opened the door, and then I almost forgave him for his brutality. Conscience had been at work, and his heart was touched. He hoped to find the boy crouched on the threshold, and I heard him sigh and mutter to himself as he shut the door and returned to his blankets. The strongest man in our party, clad as we were for the winter, could not have stood against that blizzard half an hour, and I fell asleep to dream of finding poor Charley's frozen corpse on the trail leading down to the Forks, and of his big blue eyes being wide open and staring at me in a reproachful way.

For breakfast next morning we had some canned meat—opened a new can from our slim store. We thawed it out, and all ate our full shares, and were on the point of starting out to search for the boy when one of the men was taken ill. Inside of half an hour all of us were down with pains and cramps, and it was evident that we had been poisoned by the meat. We had no antidote of any sort, and one after another went to bed to suffer the most agonizing pains and to lose consciousness. Big Ben was the hardest hit of all, while I, perhaps, suffered the least. That is, while all the others raved and shouted and lost their senses, I was all the time dimly conscious of every thing going on. The blizzard was still raging, and the thermometer was marking a still lower degree when the door opened and Charley walked in. I saw him, but I was flighty, and it seemed to me that he was dead. I remember his looking down upon each of us in a strange, scared way, and starting to retreat when one of the men shouted a louder curse.

I was the first to come back to life, as it were, and that was twenty-four hours after being first taken. The pains were gone as I opened my eyes, but I was weak and wretched, like one just over a terrible fever. The boy Charley was standing before me as I opened my eyes, and he bent down and whispered:

"You have all been terribly sick, and I think one man is dead. Can you eat something?"

I did feel a bit hungry, and I had no sooner signified it then he came to me with a bowl of broth. As I afterward learned, the storm had driven a couple of hares to seek shelter at the door, and he had secured both of them. He did not know the cause of our sickness, but suspected some calamity, and was prepared to feed us as soon as we could eat. It seemed that when Big Ben drove him out he stumbled into the ravine a quarter of a mile away, and found shelter under a ledge. How he kept from freezing to death that night heaven only knows. Indeed, heaven preserved him. It froze our water pail solid when standing within six feet of the fire, and there he was, out in the cold in a threadbare suit. When morning came he returned to the cabin to make one more appeal. He found us suffering and out of our minds, and the fire about gone out. Had it not been for him we should have frozen stiff as pokers, for on that day it was thirty-one degrees below zero all day long, and it went down almost to forty degrees when night came on.

The boy kept up a rousing fire, dressed his rabbits for soup, and all day and all night long he kept forcing strong coffee down our throats. That doubtless helped us to pull through, or at least four of us. The other man, whose name was Hale, had his teeth firmly clenched, and from the way his features were distorted and his limbs drawn up it was evident that he died in great agony. In a couple of hours I was able to be up and assist Charley in caring for the others, but it was far into night before the last man could use his tongue in a sensible manner. It was Big Ben, and when consciousness returned and he saw the white-faced boy bending over him the great tyrant whispered:

"Aye! The corpse of the lad has risen up to confront and accuse me! It was a cruel thing I did to drive him out, and the Lord will never forgive me for it!"

While out of danger we were yet weak and almost helpless, and none of us could attend the fire or do a bit of cooking for nearly a week. The whole work devolved upon the boy, and no one could have done better. He was cook, nurse, doctor and protector, all in one. He got three more hares and a couple of birds, and I don't believe a spoonful of the broth went down his own throat.

Well, I, for one, had been watching Big Ben to see what he would do. The first moment he was able to sit up he called Charley and pulled the frail little fellow down on his breast, saying:

"If you'll only forgive me I'll pray to the Lord to do the same. I'm rough and wicked, but to turn a lad like you out o' doors on such a night as that wasn't me at all. Old Satan must have had possession of me."

That great big fellow cried like a child, and Charley cried with him, and I might as well own up that we all cried. What made it more solemn was the fact that we had a corpse at the door. When it was known that Hale was dead, none of the other four of us could lift a hand. How the boy got body out of doors I never could understand, but get it out he did, and it was three long months before we could give it Christian burial.

On the morning when we got out of bed feeling pretty strong again, Charley went to bed with a fever, and before noon was raving crazy. I tell you it was awful to hear him cry out every few minutes in his delirium:

"O, Ben, don't drive me out. I'll work. I'll work as hard as I can!"

Every cry went through the big fellow like a bullet. He nursed and soothed the poor boy with all the tenderness he could command, and two or three times carried him about in his arms as a father would his ailing babe. There was a doctor at the Forks, and after dinner Big Ben braved the blizzard and made the trip down and back. The doctor could not be induced to return with him, owing to the cold, but he sent some medicine. Poor Charley was beyond human aid, however. He raved through the afternoon and night, and next morning was struck with death. His mind came back to him at the last, and as we stood over him he calmly said:

"I know I'm going to die, but I'm not afraid. I'll see father and mother in Heaven, and perhaps Brother James is there too."

While we all felt bad enough, Big Ben was completely broken down. He got down on his knees and begged Charley to forgive him, and I never saw a man feel the bitterness of an act as he did.

"Yes, I'll forgive you," replied the boy, "and if you pray to God, He'll forgive, too. Has it come night so soon again?"

"No, my child," answered one of the men.

"But I can't see any of you any more. Good-by. Let me take your hand, for——"

And with that he breathed his last, and there were two to rest in the snow until spring came. Did you ever hear of "Charley's Gulch?" Yes, of course you have, and if you have passed that way you have seen the boy's grave. The head board contains only the name—cut deep by Big Ben's knife—but the story of the boy's heroism has been told in every mining camp in Nevada, and it has never been told without bringing moisture to the eyes of all listeners.—*N. GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.

Auriferous Deposits in the Dead Rivers of the Western Sierras.

California will continue, as in the past, one of the chief gold-producing countries in the world. A prolific source of its future mineral wealth will be the dead rivers which abound in the lower western Sierras. A dead river is a channel once occupied by a running stream, but now filled and covered with gravel, or earthy or rocky matter. The dead rivers of California became such mainly through volcanic causes. This fact is nowhere more apparent than in the eastern part of Butte County, where merely a glance at the topography plainly reveals a horizontal stratum of lava in places several hundred feet in thickness that in some past age has spread over the country, crushing obstructions, filling depressions and burying a channel system as complete and extensive as the water system of to-day. This great overflow of lava came from active volcanoes, presumbly the Lassen Buttes.

Since hydraulic mining has been declared illegal, more attention is being paid to drift-gravel mining than ever before. By drift-gravel mining is meant the following of the subterranean channel by tunnel or incline, and the extraction only of the gold-bearing gravel. This mode of mining precipitates no perceptible debris upon the low lying agricultural lands, and in every case where conducted with judgment and discretion is proving remunerative in the highest degree. Appearances indicate unwonted activity in channel mining. The suppression of the ruinous system of hydraulic mining, with the increased knowledge which miners are acquiring of dead rivers, together with rich results recently realized from drift-gravel mines, all combine to direct attention to this particular branch of mining. A field of universal promise seems to be developing in Butte Country. Big Bend, the largest riverbed mine in the world, will start full force in the spring—sufficient tests have already been made to insure success. The famous Magalia mine, a few miles distant, which has yielded fabulous returns in the past, has just emerged from several years' litigation and is making ready to resume operations. The Aurora mine, a valuable and extensive property close to the Magalia and on the same channel, is about ready to start. A number of other rich claims in the Magalia ridge locality, which have only been awaiting intelligent development, are likely soon to receive attention from investors. All of which would seem to indicate that channel mining in Butte County is going to assume an importance hitherto undreamed of.—Sacramento Bee.

THE RAMADAN FEAST.

A Month Which Faithful Moslems Spend in Prayer and Fasting.

Ramadan—that terrible month of of daily fasting and mighty feasting—is, like the Chinese new year, governed by the moon. This year, precisely at the moment the new moon became visible, the evening of May 25, Ramadan began and continued throughout the lunar month. The origin of this long fast seems shrouded in mystery, as it is said to have been observed by he fire-worshipers long before Mahomet Ali, who thought the command to all true believers to fast thus eleven months in the year was quite too much to require of mortal flesh; through the Angel Gabriel he therefore besought the Great Spirit to reduce the time one-half. Finding this still a heavy trial, he again interceded and got the time fixed at one lunar month, where it still remains, and no doubt thousands of Mohamedans ardently wish the time much more reduced. By the more intelligent class it is less religously observed each passing year, but to the pious peasantry it still means real penance, as they faithfully abstain from food, drink, and even from the use of tobacco, during the entire day. Even the "Hamals" (who are the real beasts of burden here) are so conscientious about keeping this fast, that, with every nerve quivering with fatigue, and in torment with hunger they will stand with a tempting morsel in hand watching the declining sun patiently waiting until the sunset gong is heard, then devour it in beast-like haste. In homes of affluence the devoutly inclined sit at their tables, with fork or spoon in hand, waiting also for the welcome boom of cannon before they can begin their nightly feasting. As a rule, they turn night into day and vice versa. Still it is supposed some sleep is indulged in, as precisely at twelve o'clock a patrol passes through each street with a large dram, bent upon awakening all sleepers to a midnight feast, which may be prolonged until the morning twilight. Then the mouth must be carefully cleansed and the fast resumed.

When the luxurious liver feels constrained to observe this fast, he is said to resort to many ingenious devices to allay suffering. One of the most successful has been a pill of opium, wrapped in one, two and three, or more coverings of gold foil, all to be swallowed before retiring. As these coverings are gradually dissolved, the opium holds them for long hours in the desired oblivion. It is now said that but few of the aristocracy of Turkey pay any heed to this fast, still they dare not publicly disregard it. The Sultan is credited with setting an example of strict observance. If he does so literally, he must neither eat, drink nor smoke during the long summer day. Even to indulge in a delightful and refreshing perfume is sin.

This month of fasting is supposed to be a "revival season" to the Moslems, in which they are to devote much time to the study of the Koran. Hospitality, alms-giving, prayer and peacefulness are to be especially cultivated. You hear of the rich man standing at his door at sunset to salute and invite to his table the poor who happen to pass by, sending them on their way rejoicing in presents of money; but you see little of this today.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

ARTISTS' OIL COLORS.

Combinations That Are Used in the Production of Paintings.

From the cochineal insect is obtained the gorgeous carmine, as well as the crimson, scarlet and purple lakes. Sepia is the inky fluid discharged by the cuttle-fish, to render the water opaque for its own concealment when attacked. Indian yellow is from the urine of the camel. Ivory black and bone black are made out of ivory chips. The exquisite Prussian blue is got by fusing horses' hoofs and other refuse animal matter with impure potassium carbonate. It was discovered by an accident. In the vegetable kingdom are included the lakes, derived from roots barks and gums. Blue-black is from the charcoal of the vine stalk. Lamp-black is soot from certain resinous substances. From the madder plant, which grows in Hindustan, is manufactured turkey red. Gamboge comes from the yellow sap of a tree, which the natives of Siam catch in cocoanut shells. Raw sienna is the natural earth from the neighborhood of Sienna, Italy. When burned, it is burned sienna. Raw umber is an earth from umbria, and is also burned.

To these vegetable pigments may probably be added India ink, which is said to be made from burnt camphor. The Chinese, who alone can produce it, will not reveal the secret of its composition. Mastic—the base of the varnish so called—is from the gum of the mastic tree, indigenous to the Grecian archipelago. Bistre is the soot of wood ashes. Of real ultramarine but little is found in the market. It is obtained from the precious lapis lazuli, and commands a fabulous price. Chinese white is zinc. Scarlet is iodides of mercury, and cinnabar, or native vermillion, is from quick-silver ore.—N. O. Picayune.

—The scant crop of potatoes this last year suggests the inquiry whether we do not depend more upon this article of diet than its nutritive value warrants. We are apt to think it indispensable in some form, at least at breakfast and dinner, and yet the ratio of carbonaceous or heat-producing matter it contains is nearly twice as great in proportion to the nitrogenous matter as it should be to constitute a perfectly healthful food.

TEMPERANCE READING.

TRUE VICTORY.

He stood with a foot on the threshold
And a cloud on his boyish face,
While his city comrade urged him
To enter the gorgeous place.

"There's nothing to fear, old fellow!
It isn't a lion's den;
Here waits you a royal welcome
From lips of the bravest men."

'Twas the old, old voice of the tempter
That sought in the old, old way,
To lure with a lying promise
The innocent feet astray.

"You'd think it was Blue Beard's closet,
To see how you stare and shrink!
I tell you there's nought to harm you—
It's only a game and a drink!"

He heard the words with a shudder—
It's only a game and a drink!
And his lips made bold to answer;
"But what would my mother think?"

The name that his heart held dearest
Had started a secret spring,
And forth from the wily tempter
He fled like a hunted thing.

Away! till the glare of the city
And its gilded halls of sin
Are shut from his sense and vision,
The shadows of night within.

Away! till his feet have bounded
O'er fields where his childhood trod;
Away! in the name of virtue,
And the strength of his mother's God!

What though he was branded "coward!"
In the blazoned halls of vice,
And banned by his baffled tempter,
Who sullenly tossed the dice,

On the page where the angel keepeth
The record of deeds well done,
That night was the story written
Of a glorious battle won.

And he stood by his home in the starlight—
All guiltless of sword and shield—
A braver and nobler victor
Than the hero of bloodiest field!

BEING RUINED BY RUM.

The Fearful Destruction of the Traffic in the Congo Free State — What the Churches Should Do.

The greed of avarice is remorseless, and when unrestrained, amazing. It blunts moral perception, robs the soul of humane feelings, stifles conscience, defies God, and hazards the retribution of eternity with an air of supreme indifference and thoughtless levity. What a record the grasping traders, who sent in the year 1885 over ten million gallons of the vilest liquors to the wretched Africans along the Congo, have made for themselves only the books of judgment to be opened at the last day can reveal. These traders indulge in no uneasy reflections of personal responsibility, nor experience any concern for the wholesale physical misery and moral havoc with which their infamous business is cursing millions of a helpless and heathenish race. It is simply useless to argue and remonstrate with the distributing agents of intoxicating liquors. The public sentiment of Christendom must be aroused to hold such enemies of mankind in check. And to this end the facts must get a hearing; and what are some of the facts?

Unfortunately, the negro, like the Indian, takes naturally to fire-water. He welcomes it above every thing else that civilization can offer. He loves the frenzied excitement and brutal orgies into which it throws him. When rum is at hand he deliberately abandons work and surrenders himself to debauchery and drunken savagery until the supply is exhausted. It is dearer to him than cloth, beads, gilt wire and all other things. Indeed, some of the caravans going from the stations along the Congo to the interior, found that without rum they could not make exchanges at all with the natives; and when the rum gave out they had to give up business and return for more. In many places bottles of sprits are used, as currency is among ourselves.

Alcohol takes the place of specie—with this difference, that it doesn't last as specie does. One missionary complains that he finds great difficulty in assembling a sober congregation. Drink demoralizes faster than the Bible can reform the wretched victims of barbarism on the one hand, and of the white man's conscienceless temptations on the other. "To procure it they will join," we are told, "in slave hunts, and massacre their nearest neighbors. Savage by nature, drink makes devils of them, and renders all prospect of raising them vain." The Congo Free State that was founded a few years ago with so much of eager helpfulness and joy, is simply paralyzed by the demon clutch of alcohol. While Christian people are giving freely of their money and prayers and missionary efforts to disenthrall swarming millions from the dense ignorance and superstition and fetichism of heathenism, the liquor manufacturers and dealers from Christian lands are doing the devil's work in awakening a pandemonium of drunkenness around the missionary stations.

How came this appalling state of iniquity to pass? Well, at the Berlin Congress in 1884-5, which assembly, it will be remembered, decided what kind of a government and institutions the six great Powers would guarantee to the Free State of the Congo, it was ordained that free trade in every thing should be a cardinal principle. The United States and Great Britain foresaw that this meant a distribution of rum which would curse and destroy the black man, with his inherent and ungovernable appetite for it, faster than all the benefits of civilization could improve him; and so they protested against it. But the German and Dutch distillers anticipating the immense revenues which such a field promised, put in their plea, and, alas! won the day.

And they are reaping the enormous profits. Of the 10,000,000 gallons of drugged liquors exported from Christian nations in 1885 to the Congo, 8,000,000 went from Germany and the Netherlands! New England sent 737,650 gallons, and Great Britain only 311,384, and yet that was far too much. Meanwhile the doom of the poor negro is fixed unless the conscience and pity of Christendom shall unite to introduce a new order of things into his Free State. The treaties and arrangements of the Berlin Congress were to run for twenty years, but so beastly is the African's use of whisky that he will be hopelessly ruined in body and brain as well as soul by the end of this period, if there be no mitigation in the cause of his destruction. Christians, while not lessening their missionary zeal, must do something more. The churches should band together to influence the Prime Ministers and officers of the Great Powers to restrict free trade in "fire-water," and this as soon as possible.—Christian at Work.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR IT?

The Seller and the Drinker Sharers in a Temptation that Works Both Ways.

See that young man go reeling home to his mother—drunk. Look in at this other home smitten with poverty; see the man, who might have made it beautiful and happy as "the field which the Lord hath blessed," as with wild eye and nervous hand he slams open the door; see—but do not look too closely at the face of the wife which struggles so to conceal the infinite pangs of shame and sorrow and dread that burn within. Glance at—but in the name of all that is pure and sweet in life, don't read too carefully—the "crime-sweepings of the world" which so largely fill the pages of the morning dailies. Now, who does all this? Who is responsible for it?

Some say the saloon does it, and forthwith curse the saloon as the summum malum, the one supremely bad thing allowed to exist among us. Others say, the drinker himself is the guilty wretch, and hold him to be responsible for the ruin he has wrought and for all the anguish in the other hearts that ache because of his self-wreck and shame. Did he not know, before he touched the intoxicating cup, the possible demon that lurked within it? But why ask whether the liquor-seller or the liquor-dealer is the guilty party?

An earnest and intelligent Temperance man in this State, writing of the value of law as an educator, and of the necessity of holding the drinker, as well as the seller, responsible for his crime, says a law on our statute-books prohibiting drunkenness would be as if we employed heralds whose duty it should be to cry daily and hourly in every city, in every village, in the highways and by-ways: "Remember, young men, the guilt of drinking to intoxication; beware of taking the first step on the road that leads to drunkenness." Were it a crime, he adds, to drink to intoxication, all men who furnish the liquor either for money or gratuitously, would be treated as a party to the crime.

There are in Chicago, with a population of over 800,000, over 4,000 saloons. Any census which should gather up the list of drunkards and of drink-cursed homes in this city would present a hideous, an awful picture. If there were no drinkers, undoubtedly there would be no saloons. Is it then the drinkers who make the saloons? Partly. But remember, it is equally true that the saloons make the drunkards. "The devil tempted me," said Eve. The Tempter is bar-tender in every saloon. Even of books it is said that "books are not bought; they are sold." Take, for example, even such a book as General Grant's "Memoirs," more than half a million copies of which were sold. Does anybody imagine that any such number would have been bought had the book merely been put upon the shelves of the book store? It was the organized system of canvassing agents who, taking the book from house to house, sold it, when otherwise it would never have been bought. The same thing is largely true of intoxicating liquors. No other form of traffic, trade or business is pushed with more enterprise. And every saloon is a systematized temptation, an organized conspiracy against every thing that is good. The business is wicked, devilish, criminal. As the Supreme Court of the United States has just affirmed, the State has a perfect right to extinguish the business, and to do this summarily as it would abate any other nuisance. But the temptation works both ways; each party, seller and drinker, is tempter to the other. Not one or the other is guilty; both are responsible.—Chicago Advocate.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

A FUNNY THING.

Yes, I have it in my pocket;
But nobody put it there.
If you take it from my pocket
It will not be anywhere.

Curious thing this in my pocket,
Something odd, it's smaller still;
Yet you can, by adding nothing,
Make it larger if you will.

Funny thing this in my pocket,
Holding there its given space;
If you like, a second something
Easily fills the selfsame place.

This odd thing within my pocket,
Just its like was never seen,
Yet a hundred million billion
Of its kind have often been.

This queer thing within my pocket
(Don't tell any living soul;
It's a great, a wondrous secret):
This strange thing is just—a hole.

OUR TIGER.

How He Buried the Kittens and Cared for the Lambs—Always on Hand for the Right Tram.

Now, dear children, do not expect a terrible story of a wild animal, for our Tiger was only a dog.

When Jennie and I were little, we teased our papa for a dog to play with, and one night our hearts were made glad by his bringing one home to us. It had been living in one of the large freight depots in Boston, and had been so teased by little urchins, that often lounge about such places, that he was fast getting to be very cross and snappish, so it was thought best to get rid of him.

He never outgrew his dislike for boys, and would not allow them to touch him at all, but would often chase them, and sometimes bite them if they came on the premises. This hatred extended even to the youngest children, and from a little boy baby he would walk away in disgust, while he would allow a little girl to pull him about without a word of complaint.

At one time we had an old cat which was determined to rear her three little kittens in the closet of mamma's room. The kittens were repeatedly carried back to the cellar, and as often Mistress Puss would find some way to take her family back to the closet. Tiger had evidently been watching the whole operation, and decided to take affairs into his own hands, as you will see when I tell you what happened.

One day, Bridget, the cook, saw him go through the ki chen with something in his mouth. She followed carefully after him, and what do you think she found? You can not guess, I know, so I will tell you. Tiger had brought down the kittens, one by one, in his mouth, and carried them into the back yard, where having dug a hole for each, they had been placed, and carefully covered with dirt. Bridget rushed into the house, and said to us: "Oh! do come out in the yard, Tiger has made a cat's cemetery." We hurried out to see what she could mean, and found her words were true. There stood Tiger looking at his work, seeming to feel very proud to think he had found such an effectual way of keeping the kittens out of mamma's closet.

Tiger was not always so cruel as this, but sometimes showed great fondness for other animals. My papa kept many sheep, and one spring there were two little lambs born that were disowned by the mother sheep. Of course it would not do to let the little things die for want of care, so they were brought to the woodshed, and put under my mamma's protection. They were soon named Dicky and Biddy, and being fed often with warm milk from a bottle, they grew rapidly. From the first Tiger showed a great liking for the pet lambs, and would stretch himself out on the floor by the side of the basket, where he would remain for hours at a time.

One day after Dicky and Biddy had grown quite strong he got them out of the basket on to the floor. How this was accomplished we could never quite tell, but I am quite sure they had some way of making each other understand, so that he coaxed, persuaded and encouraged them to go beyond the narrow limits of the basket, and see more of the world. After a while they were not contented to roam about the shed, but extended their journeys to the yard, and sometimes away down the street.

This last habit would have proved a very troublesome one to us, if it had not been for Tiger's assistance in bringing them back. We had but to say: "Tiger! Dicky and Biddy have run away. Go find them," and away he would dash down the street after them. When he overtook them they would all stand for a few minutes as though there were an explanation of the case being given, and then he would turn around and run home with both lambs meekly following him. I have watched him many times, and I never knew him fail to bring them back.

My papa used to go to Boston every day and return at evening on the horse-cars, and Tiger could usually be found at the gate to meet him. Although these cars were constantly passing the house, Tiger never made the mistake of going to meet an earlier or a later train, but a few minutes before the customary time for my papa's arrival, Tiger could be seen going leisurely down the walk to be in readiness for the expected greeting.

At last Tiger commenced to get old, and did not like the active sports of his youthful days, but much preferred to stay in the house and lie by the fire. I ing fond of the company of the fami /, he would often creep into the sitting-room, and quietly settle himself on the hearth-rug, when mamma would sometimes say: "There is some one here whose room is better than his company." Without another word Tiger would get up, and, with tail down, and a sidelong glance at mamma, he would sneak in a crest-fallen manner, to the door to be let out. Finally when he got to be quite old he was sick and died, and it was one of the sad days of my childhood, when we buried him under the apple tree in the orchard.—Cora E. Dike, in Pansy.

THE SILLY PERCH.

They Would Not Heed Their Mother's Warning—A Fable.

"Do not go so far away, children; come back, come back!" cried Mrs. Perch, in a warning voice. "Keep in the river where it is always deep and safe, and don't swim out into the shallow water."

"Oh! but mother, why should we stay here when there is the whole world to roam in? See, everything is covered with water."

"Nonsense, child, nonsense! it is nothing of the kind; there has been a heavy rain, and the river has overflowed its banks, that is all."

"Oh! let us go, mother," pleaded the children; "there is plenty of water for us to swim in, and everybody else is going."

"But who knows whether you will ever come back?" replied Mrs. Perch, shaking her head wisely. "What is water to-day may be green fields tomorrow, and then where will you be, my dears? Gasping out your little lives on the grass, without one drop to cool your poor dry tongues. No, no; stay quietly in the river with me."

The young perch looked unhappy, and swam moodily to and fro, longing to dart away into the broad expanse of water which stretched out on eit er side. Just then a large jack came sailing pompously along, and as he passed the others he said, in his deep bass voice:

"What are you young things waiting for? Come, come; don't bury your talents in a hole when the world lies before you. Everybody is drowned, and we shall never be interfered with again. Don't waste your time; come along!" and with a majestic whisk of his tail swam onwards.

"Do not believe him; he does not know any thing about it," cried Mrs. Perch, anxiously. "Stay with me, children, I entreat you!" But she spoke to deaf ears, for all the young perch were rushing frantically after the jack, and she was left alone.

Away, away, as fast as they could swim, to take possession of the kingdom of waters; was it not true that the whole world was theirs?

But, alas! for the beautiful dream. It lasted but a few short days, and then sad was the fate of those who had put their faith in it.

The floods subsided as rapidly as they had risen; the fields in their emerald mantles became once more visible, and the little perch, not having time to get back to the river, all died for lack of water.—Little Folks.

An Indian's Sagacity.

In one of the Western States was a small village of white people.

One of these people came home one day and found that somebody had stolen a large piece of meat that had hung up by his door. His neighbors were sorry for his loss, and were talking with him about it, when an old Indian came along and asked what was the matter. They told him and he went to the place where the meat had hung, and looked about carefully. Then he spoke: "I do not know who stole your meat," said he, "but I can tell you what sort of a man he was. He was a white man. He was short, and lame in one leg. He had a dog and a gun."

Of course they all wondered how the Indian knew.

"I know he was short," said the Indian, "because he moved up this block to stand upon in order to reach the meat. I know he was lame, because one foot left a lighter mark than the other when he walked. I know he was a white man, because he turned out his toes; and I know he had a dog and gun, because here are the dog's tracks and the mark of the gun in the ground where he stood it up against the house."

Then he told them which way the thief had gone, and they followed, and caught him, and got the meat back again.

That Indian knew how to use his eyes better than the white people.—Little Men and Women.

It also contains an oil which prevents spikes and other iron work with which it is in contact from rusting.

A ROYAL SAVAGE.

The Residence of King George, the Ruler of the Tongan Islands.

We called at Tongatuba, the principal island of the Friendly, or Tongan, group, and, learning that the King was then in residence, determined to pay our respects to the celebrated old man, of whom we had heard so many and such strange stories. His house, we found, was a very nice-looking two-storied wooden building, close to the sea, and stood in a good-sized compound, fenced in on all sides. Passing through a handsome pair of cast-iron gates we arrived at the mansion itself, the veranda of which appeared to be used as a coach house, for there was proudly and snugly stored away the royal buggy; rather an anomalous sight for a palace and a strange position for an equipage of state.

There were no signs of life about the place, and failing to wake any one by repeated knocks at the front door, we decided to circumnavigate the establishment, and did so, finding it chill and lifeless everywhere till we came to a row of cool houses and upon a curious sight. There, in the veranda of one of them, squatted an ancient and dusky person, with only a scant cloth fastened about his waist, and bending his head obediently before an old woman who was literally plastering it with lime. As soon as the curious pair became aware of our presence the process in operation was arrested, and, perceiving this, we were about to address them to explain our presence and ask a few questions, when the gentleman of the limy head roared out something in a truly terrible voice, and at the same time a fine young Tongan, very oily and three-quarters nude, came rushing out from the interior toward us. With much politeness and evident agitation he conducted us away from the veranda and back to the big house, where in broken English, backed up by much gesticulation, he revealed to us the appalling fact that we had trespassed upon the privacy of no less a person than his majesty the King.

Having humbly apologized for our innocent intrusion and received a reassuring answer, we were ushered through the window into a sort of drawing-room, a well-furnished apartment, with a number of red velvet chairs set around a long mahogany table—one chair a little higher than the rest, acting, no doubt, as a throne. Here we waited for about half an hour, when his majesty entered, accompanied by an interpreter, and was graciously pleased to accord us a formal interview. He shook hands very pleasantly with our party, and we all sat down on the red velvet chairs, the interpreter squatting on the floor between.

The King, seen at closer quarters, was really a noble specimen of a semi-savage, standing quite six feet four inches, of wonderfully well proportioned and athletic build, upright as a dart, and moving grandly in spite of his advanced age.—London Globe.

WOULDN'T INTERFERE.

A Mother-in-Law Who Knows How to Keep Her Tongue from Wagging.

"No," said old Mrs. Dragon, who had just arrived for her visit at the home of her newly acquired son-in-law, Chauncy Breene, "No, I don't believe in mothers-in-law interfering in the affairs of their married children. I've always said that I never would, and I—why, Hattie Breene, you ain't using your best silverware every day, I hope."

"Yes, mamma, Chauncy likes it."

"O, he does; well, it makes an awful sight of work scouring it, and you know you ain't extra strong. But, as I was saying, I don't believe in—Hattie, I hope you don't try to keep that baby dressed in white all the time!"

"Yes, mamma dear; Chauncy dislikes colors on a baby."

"O, well, I suppose the child must wear white, then; but it must make your wash bills awful heavy. However, as I was saying—Chauncy, if I was you I'd speak to the butcher about leaving so much fat on the steak."

"Chauncy likes it that way, mamma."

"O, does he? Well, he'd better learn not to like it; it's unhealthy. You oughtn't to put sugar in tomatoes, Hattie; they're healthier without."

"But mamma, Chauncy——"

"O, if he likes them so, of course it's no affair of mine. But I won't eat them that way. Seems to me I smell tobacco smoke."

"I guess it's Chauncy's cigar smoke, mamma."

"He doesn't smoke in the house?"

"Why, yes, he—he—does—mamma."

"Mercy on us! I wonder the baby lives through it. But, of course, it's his own house and—Chauncy don't you think Hattie looks thin and pale? I noticed soon as I saw her. Hattie, you make your coffee entirely too strong."

"Chauncy, likes it so, and——"

"That's just what makes his color so bad and you know very well that you oughtn't to touch it. Chauncy, that baby mustn't wear spring heels yet. I'll change these boots you brought home this evening. And you and Hattie make a mistake in feeding the child as you do. I'll see to it's diet hereafter; and I think I must speak to your provision man about the meat and potatoes. And I think, Hattie, that your servant needs a little looking after. And, Chauncy, I'm afraid you burn too much gas, and I'm sure the furnace wastes coal. If I can find a good carpenter around here I'd like to change some of these doors. I don't believe in meddling mothers-in-law, but it's a real help sometimes to have a little advice, isn't it, children?"—Zenas Dane, in Detroit Free Press.

A STITCH IN TIME.

Cases in Which Medical Aid Is of Most Value in the Early Stages.

In the earliest stages of consumption of the lungs, it is possible to arrest the progress of the affection and secure a return to health by change of climate and of habits of life, together with wisely directed diet, exercise and hygiene generally. But this stage is often permitted to pass without any serious attention being given to it by the patient or his friends. One reason of this is the unreasonable hopefulness that is a mental characteristic of most consumptives. Besides the insignificant cough and slight symptoms of deteriorating health, which are often only to be noticed and given their true value by the experienced physician, do not carry with them any such degree of alarm as they merit. When a profuse hemorrhage occurs the feeling of security may give way to the alarm that has been felt before. Any persistent cough should be attended to before it is too late to do good. As in all diseases depending upon a special cause or micro-organism, consumption is not to be cured by drugs alone. It is possible that, as the late Prof. Flint taught, it may be a disease that has a tendency to recover of itself, but if it is "self-limited," it can only be so under the best possible sanitary and hygienic conditions.

An ordinary malarial fever is not, as a rule, dangerous to life. But any case of ague may develop into a pernicious (congestive) intermittent or remittent fever at any time. This it is that renders prompt arrest of the common ague of such great importance. For this reason also treatment by nostrums and domestic remedies too often results in an attack which no form of medication will be competent to cure. The pernicious attacks are almost invariably preceded by ordinary chills, so that when the "congestive" paroxysm does come on no one can say that there was any excuse for calling the doctor too late. Even if pernicious attacks are not developed, the subject of long-continued ague becomes broken in health, is pale, sallow and full of pains of a neuralgic character that makes life miserable; and the longer the disease persists without interruption, the more difficult it is to stop its progress and to cure the results of chronic malarial poisoning.

A large proportion of cases of valvular diseases of the heart originate in acute rheumatism. This disease attacks the joints and such organs as most resemble them in structure. The heart from its continual movements and the white fibrous materials from which it is lined and covered bears a very strong resemblance to a large joint. In rheumatic fever (inflammatory rheumatism) the main danger arises from the tendency the inflammation shows to attack the covering of the heart or the valves to be found between the cavities and at the entrance of the great artery that takes the blood to distribute it all over the body. Experience has demonstrated that the best method to prevent the disease from attacking the heart is to give large quantities of alkalies—the bicarbonates of sodium and of potassium being the best—until the acid material, which appears to be at the basis of rheumatism, is fully neutralized. This is shown by the secretion of the kidneys becoming alkaline in reaction. As long as this is not done and kept up persistently there is danger of heart trouble setting in at any moment. The younger the patient the greater the danger of these complications. Hence the necessity, in every rheumatic case, of prompt and rational treatment.

In nervous, sensitive children, slight causes are sufficient to bring on an attack of convulsions. Thus, some hard indigestible material swallowed, or the presence of worms in the digestive tube, is often enough responsible for these always alarming symptoms. If the cause can be removed, of course this should be done, and the sooner the better. One very cogent reason for the last remark is the fact that after convulsions have occurred a number of times a morbid habit becomes established in the nervous system, which is strong enough by itself to produce a return of the spasms, even after the original exciting cause has been thoroughly removed. When the "fits" return from time to time without apparent reason, we say that the patient has epilepsy, one of the most intractable of diseases. It is in cases of this description, where the cause of the convulsions can be removed, that the physician should not be called too late. If consulted sufficiently early a lifetime of misery, ending in insanity, perhaps, might be changed into one of usefulness.

There are many surgical affections which exemplify the warning this article is intended to convey. Of these cancer and sarcomas afford the best examples. When small, and before they have infiltrated the surrounding tissues or sent colonies into distant organs, if removed by the surgeon's knife they may or may not return. The chances vary a good deal, according to the variety of malignant growth which is under observation and its locality. But removed, and that at as early a date as possible after discovery, offers the best chance for life and freedom from suffering.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

BEGGING EPISTLES.

Some of the Queer Letters Translated for the President's Benefit.

Perhaps the most curious begging letters to the President are those in foreign languages. The President never sees these in the original. They are sent in batches of nine or ten to Henry L. Thomas, the official translator for the State Department. Mr. Cleveland rarely sees the whole of any of these letters, and seldom any part of them. Translator Thomas runs his learned eye over them, finds out what the request and who the beggar is, and makes a brief note in abstract of each one of the missives. These then go over to the White House to be looked over by the correspondence clerk, and, as the requests are usually even more absurd than those which come written in the English tongue, they are never shown to Mr. Cleveland, except, perhaps, when a particularly funny one drops in and the clerk or Colonel Lamont thinks it would be enjoyed all round. The letters from people who beg in foreign languages average about one a day the year through, but oftener run up to forty a month, then fall to twenty-five. They come both from Europe and America, and are most commonly written in German. Those which come from abroad are the funniest, because the writers display not only their own cranky notions, but the most eccentric ideas of the way in which the government of this country is managed. The authors are frequently foreigners who have had some residence in this country, but also come from persons who have never been here, even on an imaginary geographical trip.

One came only recently from an inventor in France. He wrote to inform the President that he had discovered a new method of facilitating travel by canal. He was sure that his method would make the United States a great deal of money, and he was only waiting to receive the necessary funds for his voyage over. A man in Switzerland wrote asking for money in an imperative way. He put his plea on the ground that the President had once been very kind to his mother, and that on this ground he should take particular pains that her children did not suffer. This letter is like the majority in two respects. It demands money and in a considerable sum, asking $3,000 for the purchase of a house. It evidently came from a man who had lost his wits. Translator Thomas does not like the reading of the epistles when they turn out to be in a large per cent from crazy writers. He finds that it has a tendency to make him melancholy.

Of a more laughable sort are the letters from writers who imagine the President has a minute knowledge of the whole country and its people, like a postmaster in a country town. The man in Spain, whose letter asked Mr. Cleveland if he knew whether his second cousin, who came to this country nearly ten years ago, was still here is a fair sample of its class. A German woman in New York wrote in sober earnest, saying that she understood from the President's message that he had the disposing of a very large surplus of money in the Nation's Treasury, and as she was poor and deserving she thought that in all justice she should have some. The western Germans write queer letters. A man who signed himself Krausskopf and dated his letter Allegan County, Michigan, has been a persistent correspondent of the President ever since he came into office. In spite of never receiving a reply, he has written again and again in ungrammatical misspelled German, demanding a part of the President's salary. He never mentions any particular sum, but is always holding out his hand for a share of it. A boy, evidently a Norwegian from his name, wrote from Minnesota not long ago. He said that he lived by the shore of a lake and was poor. He needed to earn money and was trying to do it by shooting ducks on the lake. He had only an old gun and wished, if it were possible, that the President would send him a rifle.

Mr. Thomas does not always get free from the petitioning foreignor when he leaves his office. It is not long since he was besought fervently by a Greek then staying in the city to bring it about in the State Department that a fine estate in Greece, which he declared belonged to him, should come into his possession. There was not any evidence of his ownership beyond his own statement, but he assured Mr. Thomas that if the State Department could only secure the property Mr. Bayard should have a clear $2,000 for his services. After many assurances that nothing could be done for him, he began to write to the Senators entreating them to interfere in his behalf. There was no satisfaction there, and he tried the same method on the House, asking this body in fact to compel Mr. Bayard to act for him. Rebuffed again, he turned to the Supreme Court. He visited Chief Justice Waite. "What did he say?" was asked of the crank as he returned from this mission. "He would not say a word," was the despairing reply.

Mr. Thomas has held his present position twenty-three years. He is a short, thick-set man, with good-humored face, gray beard, and gray hair closely cropped.—Cor. Chicago Tribune.

Make it Rain When You Like.

The remarkable powers and adaptability of the electric current to the uses of society have been further demonstrated by an invention which has at least the charm of novelty. This is nothing more nore less than a patent to open the windows of heaven at the will of man, and Michael Cahill, M. D., of San Francisco, is the inventor.

"I expect to see the sage brush deserts of Nebraska and Nevada under cultivation and affording pasturage for thousands of cattle in a few years," said the doctor.

"By what extraordinary means do you intend to tap the clouds and interfere with the laws of nature?" queried the reporter.

"Simply by a condenser or captive balloon and an electric cable placed wherever the rain is required. I have long believed that rain could be produced by artificial means, and I have worked at this hobby of mine for several years—ever since I left college, in fact. You see, first of all, vapor as it ascends, receives heat from the solar rays, which also impels it upward until restricted by the cold. The vesicles, or dewdrops, being crowded together, become electrified and float on the air at an altitude of from 3,000 to 5,000 feet, and all that is required then to produce rain is to intercept the vesicles by artificial means. What I have invented is a condenser of peculiar shape and construction and connected with the earth by an electric cable. Whenever the vesicle comes into contact with the condenser or current they are broken up and the water forced to the ground with great rapidity. The rain will be produced by the law that causes condensation on a window pane. The surface of the glass is covered with microscopic points, and on becoming chilled the layer of air next it falls, allowing the vapor to flow on to the points and thence to the ground."

"You will require a gigantic balloon for such a purpose," was suggested.

"Oh, no. A condenser of about two hundred feet in diameter will bring down something like 25,000,000 gallons a day and as much as would irrigate almost half of this State. The volume of water can be preserved or formed into rivers, whichever may be desired."—San Francisco Chronicle.

Plain Talk.

Dr. Munhall, the Evangelist, in his sermon to men and boys, in Baltimore, recently, among many other startling truths, uttered the following:

"I have seen men made driveling idiots and loathsome diseases transmitted to wife and children. Our organs are so delicate that, if we violate the laws of their construction, we bring swift destruction upon ourselves. If you sow wild oats you will reap them. God will not stop you. Some of you think you'll sow them a while, then settle down and marry a fine girl. You won't do that everytime. Every girl has as much right to sow wild oats as every man. Society allows certain liberties to men who can sin and then be considered respectable, but not to women. I would not wipe my feet on such society. It's as rotten as hell. Your sister has as much right to play the harlot as you. If you take advantage of somebody's sister, somebody may do the same with yours. No girl of good sense would marry a man whom she knew to be so tainted. If you violate the laws of your physical nature, and tainted, marry some girl, your children will be abnormally developed. The stock of a licentious man runs out at the fourth generation. It is the law of God. The children's teeth get on edge from the sour grades. Disease is constitutional. They say intemperance is a giant evil, but the great sin in this country to-day is licentiousness. What is the trouble with France? It is because she takes so little account of the marriage relation. Last year in Paris there were 75,000 illegitimate children. This thing is actually condoned there. In fifty years, in my judgment, if France, in her city life, does not turn away from licentiousness, she will be blotted from the map of Europe.

"Licentiousness is eating up the strength of our young men. Hundreds of them have the evidences of it in their faces, and they are going to hell. If the laws of these genital organs of ours are obeyed, they will produce the sweetest happiness. There is nothing so sweet as a happy home filled with joyous, healthy children. There are two things better than money, a right conscience and a good name. You had better be poor here and rich hereafter. When Commodore Vanderbilt was dying, worth one hundred millions, an old woman came and sang the hymn, "Come ye Sinners, Poor and Needy.' 'Sinner poor and needy?" he asked. 'Yes that's me.' Down in Wall street the question was, 'How much did he leave?' and it was answered, 'He left all he had.' I could wish you might spend all your days here in a poorhouse if you can get to heaven at last. You'll be rich there."

The Western Way.

"You don't fool the farmers of Michigan very much," said a citizen the other day, who had just returned from the interior.

"What was your game?"

"I had none, but along towards night I broke down about three miles from anywhere. I pulled the buggy out of the road, hitched the horse to a fence and hoofed along to the nearest farm house. When I had told my story the farmer said to the hired man:

"John, he may be honest, or he may be after our pork. I'll hold him here with the shotgun while you go and see if his horse and buggy are there.'

"He ordered me to sit down, and then he took a seat in front of me with a gun across his knees, and my every movement was watched until John's return. Then they half believed in me, but as I went to bed my door was locked on the outside, and when I got ready to leave in the morning the farmer took me aside and said:

"'My friend if you're all right you needn't be afraid. If you've got an eye on my horses, however, I want to say that I set two bear traps every night, turn out my three dogs, and John and me sit up all night with shotguns. We are all ready and jist aching to make somebody seasick!"—Detroit Free Press.

A Narrow Escape.

First Omaha burglar—I tell you it's awful the way things are in New England—twenty or thirty women to every man.

Second Omaha burglar—I suppose so. All the meu have come West.

"Yes, that's how it is."

"Did you get much boodle there?"

"Yes; but I had a narrow escape once. I noticed a lot of the finest diamonds you ever saw on a Boston girl just going out of the house to a lecture or something and I watched my chance and got in and hid under her bed. You see I was thinkin' she would be so interested in the lecture she went to that she wouldn't think to look for burglars, you know."

"Yes."

"But when she came in the first thing she did was to look under the bed, and there she saw me."

"Did she scream or faint?"

"She just grabbed me with both hands and held on like grim death."

"Eh? How did you get away?

"I explained to her that I already was married and she let me go."

BEAUTIFUL TRIBUTE.—The following is credited to the Arizona Howler: "Tears are in our voice as we record the sudden demise of that esteemed lawyer and good all-around man, Billy Swipem. His taking away by death, the ruthless snatcher, will be regretted as well by the barkeepers as by the bar of our hustling town, which is now experiencing a boom such as it never experienced before. Corner lots are going like hot cakes, and the voice of the tenderfoot is heard in the land. Billy has gone to the sweet far away, and we doubt not his spirit is mingling in sweet converse with the spirits that are there. Immediately after the funeral, which is to take place on Tuesday, the Widow Muldoon's lot, No. 14, section 17, plot 4, will be raffled off at Al. Blodget's saloon, and it is hoped that the boys will give the charming widow a firstclass send-off. The Howler's office boy will be there with his trusty pistol to collect back subscriptions, and we bespeak for him a kindly reception."

If the latest advices from China concerning the recent great flood in the Chinese province of Honan are to be accepted as trustworthy, this calamity must be considered as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, ever visited the earth, It is now said that at least three thousand populous villages were completely drowned out, with all their inhabitants. The number of lives lost is now numbered in the millions. A correspondent of one of the London papers, writing of the deluge, says: "I am told in hundreds of instances on the present occasion, when the waters rushed into the cities, sweeping walls, houses and everything down before them, the people refused to stir, and met their deaths with that wonderful indifference which characterizes the Chinese in some cases, for the Celestial is nothing if not a fatalist of the most pronounced and unreasoning type." Doubtless full and accurate accounts of the disaster will be forthcoming soon.

A cat's eyes are said to be largest at midnight. We never made an examination, but we are positive that its voice is about seventeen times larger at that hour than at any other period during the twenty-four.

Another Lincoln Anecdote.

Seymour Custis is one of the characters of Stratford. He went to the war as fifer, and since has been what may be called an ardent working Republican. He comes to Bridgeport nearly every day, and on his last visit told the following anecdote, never before printed:

During the Presidential campaign of 1855, when John C. Fremont was the Republican nominee, Mr. Curtis, in company with James Booth, came to this city to hear Lincoln speak. As Lincoln stepped upon the platform to begin his speech, Booth said to Curtis: "What a homely man: He's the homeliest man I ever saw!" But as Lincoln talked and waxed eloquent, Booth brought his clenched fist down on Curtis' knee (and the latter said he hit hard), and said: "Seymour Curtis, he is not so bad looking, after all! He grows handsomer all the time." At last, with a sledghammer blow of his fist on Curtis' knee, Booth exclaimed: "Curtis, he is the handsomest man I ever saw!"—New York Tribune.

How the Sparrows Came.

The English sparrow's advent here is very like the rabbit which Australia is so anxious to get rid of. A miller caterpillar, indigenious to this climate, was found to be destroying the trees in the parks, besides being a nuisance in consequence of its propensity to hang from the trees by a web-like thread. Persons passing under the trees were liable to have the crawling creatures drop down their necks or upon their clothes, and some remedy was sought to rid New York of these pests. A foreigner suggested the importation of a few sparrows. Seventy-five pairs were brought over from the Old World, and the severe winter which followed killed the birds. A second attempt was made, and every one was asked to care for the little creatures and build sparrow houses. This was done and the sparrows were saved the next winter. The young broods raised in the country were soon able to take care of themselves. It did not take long for the acclimated foreigners and their descendants to migrate, and now they are found all over the United States.

The Precocious Child.

As a rule, the precocious child is of a scrofulous diathesis, with a fair, brilliant complexion, blue eyes and golden hair, beautiful to look on, according to popular standards. He is delicately sensitive to mental impressions and alive to the conversation of persons much older than he.

He generally goes on in his unique career, outstripping his brothers and sisters, as well as his schoolmates, in the committing of tasks at school, as well as in the reading of books far beyond their comprehension.

This generally goes on until the age of puberty, when he begins to falter. The hectic flush is seen upon the fair cheek, the eye becomes more brilliant, and the finer and more spiritual elements come out with almost supernatural intensity.

By and by a slight cough and phthisis tuberculosis has laid the foundation of premature death.—Popular Science Monthly.

Gems for Thought.

Even reproofs can be kindly given.

The greatest good is done most quietly.

He who does not look before lags behind.

The greatest cunning is to have none at all.

Don't expect too much from those around you.

He has much to do who would please every body.

More people are drowned in the bowl than in the sea.

Have a high aim in life and do your best to reach it.

Listen to both sides of a question before you decide.

It is nothing to begin; perseverance is everything.

You will not be loved if you care for none but yourself.

Make good use of to-day; you are not sure of to-morrow.

Great people generally work their way up through difficulties.

He that speaks doth sow, but he that holds his peace doth reap.

Where there is no want of will there will be no want of opportunity.

The greatest misfortune of all is not to be able to bear misfortune.

The one prudence in life is concentration, the one evil is dissipation.

A child who sees deceit around it will rarely make an honorable man.

Let us take good care of our days and our years will take care of themselves.

BALTIMORE.

A. S. ABELL. GEORGE W. ABELL.

EDWIN F. ABELL. WALTER R. ABELL.

The BALTIMORE WEEKLY SUN continues to preserve its position, maintained for many years, as a model Family Newspaper. During the past year, in order to accommodate the great variety of matter seeking admission to its columns, it has been found necessary to issue a Supplement almost every week, presenting a home newspaper unequaled for freshness and variety. Its literary features are selected with discriminating taste and with special reference to the entertainment and instruction of the family circle. Its Agricultural and Veterinary Departments, edited by specialists, have been of great value to the Farmer, while its Fashion Articles, Household Recipes, etc., have continued to be a source of weekly interest and instruction to ladies. The latest news up to the hours of publication is given in its correspondence and telegraphic dispatches, while its editorials, besides discussing current events in an impartial spirit, afford much wholesome advice and suggestion on social, economic and other topics. The proceedings of Congress, the Maryland and other Legislatures, the National Political Conventions, and the Presidential and Congressional elections are among the important features that will be promptly and copiously presented in its columns during 1888.

A Great National Journal.

THE NEW YORK

Mail and Express

The Advocate of the Best Interests of the Home—The Enemy of the Saloon. The Friend of American Labor. The Favorite Newspaper of People of Refined Tastes Everywhere.

For many years the daily edition of the New York MAIL AND EXPRESS has been recognized as the leading afternoon paper of the metropolis, while its weekly edition has been THE FAVORITE HOME PAPER in thousands of families in every State in the Union. It has attained its great popularity and influence by its enterprise in the collection of news, the purity of its tone, and the ability and courage of its advocacy of the Right on all questions of public interest.

FOR 1888 the MAIL AND EXPRESS will be a better paper than ever, and, as a clean, interesting, instructive

Home Newspaper,

it solicits comparison with any other in the country. It is one of the LARGEST PAPERS PUBLISHED anywhere, and spares neither labor nor expense to secure for its readers the very best in all departments of newspaper literature.

OUR POLITICS.

We believe the Republican party to be the true instrument of the POLITICAL PROGRESS of the American people; and holding that the honest enforcement of its principles is the best guarantee of the national welfare, we shall support them with all our might; but we shall always treat opposing parties with consideration and fair play.

AGAINST THE SALOON.

The MAIL AND EXPRESS is the recognized leading journal of the country in the great Anti-Saloon Republican movement. It believes that the liquor traffic as it exists to-day in the United States is the enemy of society, a fruitful source of corruption in politics, the ally of anarchy, a school of crime, and, with its avowed purpose of seeking to corruptly control elections and legislation, is a menace to the public welfare and deserves the condemnation of all good men.

In brief, all who wish to have in their homes a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER of national scope, broad views, clean pages and courageous, yet kindly, utterances on all questions of general public interest, will not be disappointed in the MAIL AND EXPRESS, and we respectfully solicit their influence and support.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—WEEKLY, per year, $1.00; six months, 60 cents; three months, 30 cents. DAILY, per year, $6.00; six months, $3.00; three months, $1.50; one month, 50 cents.

PREMIUMS.

EVERY SUBSCRIBER to the WEEKLY who sends ten cents to pay for packing and postage receives as a present from the MAIL AND EXPRESS ANY TWO of our elegant Premium Portraits of Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Logan and Beecher, exact copies of the finest crayon likenesses, 21x27 inches in size, sent to his address free and postpaid.

FOR $1.50 we send the MAIL AND EXPRESS one year and a copy of Munkacsy's great painting of Christ Before Pilate, richly and artistically reproduced in 20 colors. The original of this great painting was recently sold for over $100,000.

A LARGE LIST of other popular and valuable premiums are offered to subscribers and agents on the most liberal terms. They cannot be described here. Send for our circular.

AGENTS WANTED.

We want a good agent in every town and village where we have not one now at work. Send for our Special Circular to Agents and see our liberal offers.

POSTMASTERS and their ASSISTANTS, and all others who wish to increase their income, will find this an excellent opportunity.

SAMPLE COPIES sent free to all applicants. Send for one and enclose the addresses of your friends. Address simply THE MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

TORPID LIVER

Is known by these marked peculiarities:

1. A feeling of weariness and pains in the limbs.
2. Bad breath, bad taste in the mouth, and furred tongue.
3. Constipation, with occasional attacks of diarrhœa.
4. Headache, in the front of the head; nausea, dizziness, and yellowness of skin.
5. Heartburn, loss of appetite.
6. Distention of the stomach and bowels by wind.
7. Depression of spirits, and great melancholy, with lassitude and a disposition to leave everything for to-morrow.

A natural flow of Bile from the Liver is essential to good health. When this is obstructed it results in which, if neglected, soon leads to serious diseases. Simmons Liver Regulator exerts a most felicitous influence over every kind of biliousness. It restores the Liver to proper working order, regulates the secretion of bile and puts the digestive organs in such condition that they can do their best work. After taking this medicine no one will say, "I am bilious."

"I have been subject to severe spells of Congestion of the Liver, and have been in the habit of taking from 15 to 20 grains of calomel which generally laid me up for three or four days. Lately I have been taking Simmons Liver Regulator, which gave me relief without any interruption to business."—J. HUGG, Middleport, Ohio.

CAN SHE TRUST HIM!

Inez Clair turned her haughty dark face from the gypsy, and crossed the sward to where her lover and her cousin stood.

"What did she tell you, that your lips curl so, Inez?" asked Roy Alton with a smile; one would almost fancy the old witch had tried to make you fear some evil."

"She did," answered the girl scornfully, her dark eyes flashing; "falsehood and treachery are evils, are they not? She said they were about me—falsehood on the lips I kissed treachery in the hearts I trusted. Bah! how foolish it is to give one's hand to such a creature and allow her to say such things."

"One never does so in faith," laughed pretty golden-haired Beatrice Laven, the cousin, who, being orphaned and penniless, owed all things to the generous and wealthy Inez.

"And why not, my beautiful lady?" asked the old crone, who had followed Inez, and paused near. "Is it that you doubt, because my eyes might pierce the mask you wear, and my lips might speak of the arts you use, by which you make a man false to his plighted word, and plunge into the heart of one who has been kind to you a dagger keen enough to slay her? Your fair face is false, lady, and your blue eyes are full of fear; yet you paled not when you stole out to meet another's affianced husband, and you feared not that he who was won in falsehood would be as false some day to yourself. Ah, blue-eyed beauty with the traitorous heart, will you let me read the lines of your hand and warn you?"

Beatrice shrank under the eyes of the sorceress, and clung to Roy's arm, her fair face deathly in its whiteness.

"She is horrible! Let us go," faltered the rose-leaf lips.

And the crone laughed as they went slowly away for her through the sunlight.

"Pride and love and treachery and falsehood!" muttered the gypsy. "Of such things can I prophesy to all, and never speak amiss. But for this fair beauty, and the man beside her—I was abroad last night, and they did not see me, as they talked of love which must be kept secret. Bah! such love must die, as die the roses. I read all human hearts, and they give me gold, thinking I read the stars."

Meanwhile, through the scents of the May time went the three, and Roy whispered a low word to Beatrice, which Inez did not hear.

Untroubled by the crone's predictions, with faith as strong as the love in her proud true heart, Inez never dreamed of suspecting that her lover's whispers could be "but stricken air," or that the hearts she leaned on and fully trusted planned their treachery at her very side.

Roy lingered at the stately home of Inez until the moon was high, and she accompanied him down the steps, and part of the way to the gate that divided their father's lands.

There, in the clear light of the full May moon, they said good night and she stood watching him as he went, until the shadows hid him from her.

"My love—my kingly loyal love!" she murmured.

Then a sudden thought came—she had not told him of a certain plan for the morrow, formed by herself and Beatrice.

She would flirt after him, glide up to him ere he reached the gate, slip her hand in his, and laugh at his glad surprise.

With light feet she hurried after, reached the shadows which had enfolded him, passed through them and paused, like a startled doe, on their edge, a fierce incredulous scorn growing in her eyes, her proud face blanching, swiftly, sharply, as blanch the faces of those smitten suddenly to the heart.

He stood before her, only a few feet away—her lover, her promised husband—with a slight white-clad figure in his arms, a dainty golden head, uncovered to the moon beams, nestling close to his heart, while her cousin's red lips laughed merrily up at him, and her cousin's white hand held back his face from hers.

"Nay," Inez heard the girlish voice say, with the laugh in it, "you shall not kiss me. The gypsy said you would be false to me, some day, as you are now to Inez."

"And you doubt me—you, who have made me chafe against my bondage until I am willing to free myself in any way, at any cost, for your sake?"

The girl in the shadows heard it all—heard, and made no sign. The love of long years, of her youth, was dying, but dying as the strong die, in silence.

The faith that had lived in her heart for this man was breaking as break the gossamers of the spider's, weaving in the storm; but she gave no cry, made no sound, only stood heart-sick and soul-wounded, on the very edge of the shadows.

"If Inez heard you say that I think she would set you free! said Beatrice.

And Inez, with a sudden hardly-drawn breath crossing her whitened lips, advanced till she stood beside them.

"You are right, my cousin," she said unwaveringly. "I have heard, and I set him free—free of all things save the reproach I must ever feel for an acted lie. Here, Roy?"

She drew off and extended towards him the ring with which he had plighted her.

He, startled, shamed, shrinking under the steady scornful gaze of her dark blue eyes, with his arms fallen from about her cousin, and his face crimson with hot, traitor-bood, felt the old spell fall over his heart once more and the new one pass from it.

"Inez, he said pleadingly, "listen I will ——"

But she unclosed her fingers, and the ring fell at her feet. She turned and passed again into the shadows.

Beatrice laid her hand on his arm and smiled in his face.

"You are now free, Roy," she said softly. "Are you not glad?" He looked down at the fair face that had so charmed him, and it suddenly lost all beauty for him.

"You want me to answer honestly?"

"Why, of course!"

"Then"—he spoke through shut teeth—"then, Beatrice, no, I am not glad! I would give all I own to have all things as they were before your coming between Inez and myself. Now you understand, and now will you care to wear the ring she cast back to me?"

A hot color lived transiently in the pretty face, then died; a look of pain was followed by a flaming wrath in the blue eyes.

"No!" rang out her angry silver tones; no, Roy Alton! False to her, and false as well to me!"

And she left him standing, wondering at his own sensations, feeling a dull pain at his heart for the broken troth, although an hour before he had wished it broken.

Fate sometimes grants a prayer, in very scorn of man.

* * * * * *

Five years later, Inez Claire, still unwedded, although Beatrice had for years been the wife of a man old enough to be her father, but wealthy, Inez Claire entered a city hospital by merest chance.

The nurses were gliding from couch to couch, silent, gentle, soothing, now laying soft cool hands on a flushed cheek, now touching with silent fingers a bandage, now houlding a draught to fevered lips.

Inez followed one whose voice and touch seemed to calm and heal, as she went among the sufferers; and this one paused at last, and stood long gazing on the wan, worn face of a man which lay still on his pillow.

Such a white cold face—such a thin bloodless face. Inez felt her own pulses pause as she looked on it; then a low agonized cry broke from her, and she darted forward and caught the nurse's arm.

"Is he dead? Oh, tell me that he is not dead—my love, my love!"

The nurse took her hand gently and laid a finger on her own lips.

"He is sleeping," she said softly—"they sleep so after a long fever. Ah, his eyes unclose! Back, my dear lady, do not let him see you, lest it may excite him, and he is so weak,"

But his lids were lifted, his eyes were fastened on the face of Inez, and with an effort he put out a thin weak hand.

"Inez," he whispered, "Inez, will you stay beside me for a little while. It will be but a little while, for I am dying. But stay, Inez, because—because, dear, I have seen no woman like you in all the years since that May night, and my—my—heart has ached for you—beyond my telling. I was weak, false, but—but—"

"Hush," faltered Inez, bending over him until her lips almost touched his cheek, "speak no more, Roy, I will stay and you shall not die for I have pardoned the past, and the old love has not perished."

"Stay," whispered the nurse; "bid him sleep, and have no fear for his life. He is but weak after a long fever."

And so they met, and the old love which had slept for a brief time in the man's heart, lulled by the charm of a new fair face, awakened, to sleep no more; and the woman, never having forgotten, forgave as readily as most loving women do, even the lover who returns repentant from his straying.

A month later there was a quiet wedding at which Beatrice was not present. When she heard it, the fair beauty smiled a trifle scornfully.

"How can she trust him!" she asked. "He was false to her once, and as false to me," she added, with a touch of angry bitterness.

But Inez feared no rival now.

The Way to Succeed.

Young man, you, we mean, who are just starting in the business of farming in your own particular account, and are limited in means, don't let your ideas run into extravagances, but keep them down to a plain, sensible, practicable level. You are beginning at the bottom of the ladder, and if you can't now reach to its topmost round, don't despair. Those who have got up that far through their own efforts commenced where you are beginning. We are not going to disguise the fact that the ascent will be to you through much toil, many hardships and perhaps a good many depressing circumstances. However, you have it in your power to steer clear of much that goes to make up the hard lot of many farmers. If nature has endowed you with a good outfit of health and strength, a willingness to put your own shoulder to the wheel, a disregard of the opinsons of a class of people in the world who ulspise the day of small beginnings, a determination to make the utmost of the possibilities surrounding you, and withal an unconquerable ambition to succeed all along the way, you will derive great satisfaction from the thought and consciousness of your steady progress, and, after all, you will not think your lot such a hard one as you sometimes imagined it would be at the outset.—American Farmer.

The New Year.

The following are some facts about the year 1888:

The year 1888 will be a leap year.

There will be 5 eclipses, 3 of the sun and 2 of the moon.

Fourth of July will come on Wednesday, March 25 will be Palm Sunday, March 30 Good Friday, and April 1 Easter Sunday.

Washington's Birthday falls on Wednesday.

Memorial Day will come on Wednesday, so that there will be 3 successive legal holidays on that day of the week.

Christmas, 1888, will come on Tuesday.

The first ember day, or the day set apart by church orders for special fasting and prayer, will be February 22 1.

Girls can pop the question in 1888.

The year 1888 will have one extra night in which John can set up with his darling Mary Ann.

March 11 will be mid-Lent—which is to say, that a number of people will be glad it's half over.

It was a fine vein of satire that Mr. Frye indulged in when he referred to the sudden and unnatural anxiety of the Democrats as to the evil effects of the repeal of the whiskey tax on the cause of temperance, and he reiterated what we stated last Saturday when we said that "the temperance sentiment of the country was rapidly crystallizing into the opinion that the sooner the tax on whiskey was repealed, the better and quicker the principles of temperance would be subserved."—*N. COUSINS.

I met her in the summer by the loud-resounding sea,
And I thought it quite peculiar she should waste her time on me.
When I begged an explanation she devoutly bowed her head:
"I will tell you, you're a fellow after my own heart," she said,

I assumed the post of suitor, as I thought it not a sin
To have her think me more than kind, a little less of kin,
For the fellowship of cousins, if they be of different sex,
Has forever been a trouble and I fear 'twill ever vex.

I read to her from Byron in a tent pitched on the sand;
With the freedom of relationship, I often pressed her hand;
Or in a creaky, rattling gig we joggled thro' the lanes
While my sweetest of divinities shook out the leathern reins.

Till at last I looked upon her as a very tender friend;
(Thus man's fellowship with cousins, if they're fascinating, ends.)
I recalled to my remembrance from some closet of my head,
"You're a fellow after my own heart," the pretty witch she said.

So I marshaled all my feelings in a sentimental way,
And I quoted the expression to my second-cousin May.
But a neater, cooler answer mortal man will never get:
"You still are after it, dear Jack; you haven't caught up yet."

"HE."

What the Telephone Revealed to Aunt Sophronia.

John King lived three miles out of the town of Stanton, in the country. He was a bright young fellow, who owned a productive farm, with all the stock his acres could feed, and a pleasant old house; yet he found it hard to persuade pretty Martha Carter to marry him. She liked him; he had coaxed that confession from her own rosy lips, but she was young, gay, very fond of society and the only child of a widow; it was the old lilt, and John King, who was ten times as much in love with her as she with him, was well-nigh distracted. As his Aunt Sophronia, a maiden lady who kept house for him, said:

"I canna leave my mammy yet;"

"He ain't good for nothin'. I wish't he was married an' done with't, and I was safe back to Elnathan's. He don't remember nothin'. I send in to Stanton by him for such things as is needful to keep the house agoin', and he don't never fetch one of them, without I set to and give him a written out list and pin it onto his coat. Nor he don't care nothin' about the critters; Hiram has to do the hull on't; and to leave costly critters like them to hired help ain't what a man had ought to do. Not but what Hi is real reliable, but John don't take no int'rest, not a mite!"

It was all true. John was good for no sort of work as long as Mary Carter turned the cold shoulder to him; but after a year of persistent courting she began to show a gentler countenance to her devoted lover; he began to hope.

About that time a telephone company set up its office at Stanton, and sent its spider-threads all abroad over the surrounding country; and it struck John Stanton that here was another way to make his home attractive to Matty. By this invention he could establish communication every hour with the village, even oftener if it was needed; so that she need not be so separated from her mother as she had dreaded—Mrs. Carter being wise enough to refuse a home with her son-in-law.

So John had a telephone put into the "keepin'-room" of the farm-house, and told Mattie the very next Sunday night that whenever she made up her mind to accept him he would place one in her mother's parlor, so they could talk together whenever they liked.

It was not so much this expensive attention that softened the little beauty's heart as the proof it gave of John's eagerness to do every thing and any thing for her comfort or pleasure, and, as she was more ambitious and selfish than affectionate, she began to feel that it was agreeable to be a queen.

However, this is not a love story. Matty is only introduced to account for the telephone. Now, about two miles beyond John King there lived a family of Millers, consisting of two elderly men, Aaron and Joseph Miller, and a woman a little older than either of them, as their housekeeper. These men were farmers, but they had had thrown a dam across a wild brook that crossed their farm just where it dashed through a small, deep valley, and, obtaining a good water power, had built a grist and saw mill, which brought them in more money than all the rest of the farm.

Miss Sophronia Perkins, John King's aunt, whom we have already mentioned, hated these neighbors thoroughly; what reason or unreason there was for this feeling on her part, nobody knew; but there was enough in the outward aspect of the men to account for a rational measure of dislike in any woman; they were tall, sturdy fellows, dark of skin, rough, surly and dirty always; stingy with their money, unsocial in their manners, and the woman who worked for them had an unsavory reputation.

The Miller farm, lying far back from the high-road behind a black hemlock grove, on a plateau half way up certain rugged hills, was the sort of a place a novelist would select for a robbery or a murder, so adapted was the mise en scene to suggest such ideas, and so fit was the aspect of the two Millers to their place of abode.

But there are many just such men and just such desolate farm-houses in New England, and no crime worse than greed and selfishness enters their hearts or homes.

The Miller brothers were proverbially "near;" but no one except Sophronia Perkins ever imagined any harm of them. They were "curus actin' creturs," or "smart at sixpences;" nothing worse was laid to their charge.

When Aaron Miller heard that John King had put in a telephone, he saw directly the advantage the instrument would be to them in their daily increasing business, and after due consideration with Joe the wire was extended to their mill, and proved a daily convenience; for they had a flour and feed store in Stanton which Joseph attended to, going in early every morning and driving back at night. Now he could send out orders to Aaron as soon as they came in, notify him of the arrival at the station of grain for their grinding, or transact directly any matter of business heretofore necessarily delayed till he reached the farm at evening.

After the telephone was put in at John King's, Miss Sophronia found it a great solace to her loneliness, nightly enjoying the few moments of daily gossip with her friends in the village who happened to be possessed of an instrument. In fact, it was to her like a new toy to a solitary child, and when the line was extended to Millers' Mills, and she learned their call, she used her listener for the unworthy purpose of listening to her neighbors' affairs.

I own that this was neither an honest nor an honorable proceeding on Sophronia's part. I do not mean to apologize for it, but, as the papers say, there were "extenuating circumstances." She had never been taught honor. It was not a recognized virtue in the farm-house where she was brought up. People who wrest their daily living from the barrenness of our gaunt New England hill-sides do not study the loftier trait of manhood when they have done their day's work; and as for honorable instinct, every man will allow that is not inherent in a woman.

Then she was very lonely; and now that John's gray horses were hitched every day in front of Mrs. Carter's house she saw less than ever not only of John, but of the hired man, Hiram, who had double duty to do in the master's absence, and went from his supper to his bed quite too tired to talk.

There was a certain social consolation on Mondays when black Dinah came to wash; but even Dinah had little to tell, since her old shanty was nestled down in a warm hollow on the south side of Huckleberry Hill, quite off the high road. Yet she was some one to speak to; an item not to be disregarded in such solitude.

It is not, after all, very strange that Miss Sophronia, limited to five minutes' conversation with the few friends in Stanton who had telephones, should amuse herself by hearing the conversations of the two Millers, the growls of Aaron, the snarls of Joseph, and now and then the shrill interrogations of Lyddy Ann Granger, the objectionable housekeeper.

Shocked reader! did you ever live in the deep country on an isolated farm?

If not, you do not know what silence and solitude are. Imagine a clean, sparsely furnished house, where the ticking of the old clock rasps your ear like a continuous knell, where not one fly is allowed to buzz his assiduous life out on the sunny panes; where the very cocks and hens are abroad all day in the far fields, and the dog lies asleep just inside the barn door; where the air is still as a windless lake, and the chirr of a suddenly roused cricket makes you jump; or the swift, ambiguous scurry of a mouse somewhere in wall or wainscot seems like the rush of a troop of horse to the strained and apprehensive sense; and the rustle of your own garments sounds like the trailing of ghostly robes to the tense ear; the shadow of a waving bough startles the alert eye, and the roll of a passing wagon, the rush of fluttering swallows in the chimney, sound like peals of thunder, and constrings the heart with that elemental dread.

Yes; this telephone was a real social gospel to Sophronia, shivering and trembling in her nervous loneliness; if she had been reared in such a place, use and want perhaps, would have strengthened her against its terrors, but until John's mother died she had always lived in her brother's family, and in his great house where ten children and a bustling wife made noise enough through the round year to frighten the very ghosts out of the garret, or the mice out of the wall, and where the neighbors were abundant and much given to visiting, Sophronia had never been conscious of nerves; nor did she know these terrors now as the result of nerves; she only confided to Hiram as she dealt out to him the boiled dinner which he shoveled down in grim silence after the fashion of his kind:

"I do set a sight by that telephone thing; it's real company. I hev been gettin' real pernickity along back, it is so dreadful lonesome here; but now I do sense that tho' is people pretty nigh, seein' I can call to 'em; it's folksy to hear that little bell go, 'ping!' every now and then as though somebody was there. Dinah, she is a'most scared to death with it; she says it is like hearin' of a sperit talk; same as Job says in Scripter, when 'the hair of his head stood up,' and he 'heard a voice.' But then he see the sperit first, and that is more fearsome. Dinah won't hark to it noway. I can tell who 'tis every time. My! I can hear Aaron Miller snap, just as plain! and Lyddy Granger bawl!"

"B'n a-talkin' to 'em, hev ye?" curtly asked Hiram.

"No, I haven't! and I ain't agoin' to," responded Sophronia, sharply; "but they spend the hull o' their time a-gabbin to and fro. I shouldn't think there'd be no grist ground, never, to that mill. I can't take the horn down to speak to nobody but what they've got holt o' the wire first, and I can't help a-hearin' of 'em holler."

Hiram shot a keen glance at her from under his busy, grizzled eyebrows; he had long ago taken her measure, and he knew very well now how she had been amusing herself; but as he always said of himself that he "was one who made a fortin' mindin' his own business," he offered no remarks.

Shortly after this conversation John King went away from home to attend a sale of cattle in New Jersey; he expected to be gone a week, as he meant to drive home what animals he bought himself, rather than send them by boat or railway, which he considered was too great a risk.

The day he left a severe northeast storm set in, and Hiram set himself to do some work in the further barn, which he had kept to do in a "spell of weather," so that Miss Sophronia had not even the relief of his occasional appearance in kitchen or shed to beguile her solitude, her knitting had stopped for want of yarn, and she had "pieced up" the last bit of calico she could find.

As she sat in the dull light of the kitchen window, listening to the heavy rush of rain against the house and the wild moan of the wind shrieking in the spout, she heard the telephone ring; it was a joyful sound to her tired and lonely soul; she hurried to the instrument, took down the listener, and heard Joseph Mills say:

"Say, Aaron! has he b'en doin' of it ag'in?"

"You bet!" growled Aaron.

"Well, I sha'n't come out to-night; the brook'll be up 'crost the road, I presume likely, and you won't grind none in this high water."

"No; tho' a'n't no use of your comin'."

"Say, has she gone?"

"Went this mornin'."

"Good! you can fix him now!"

"I guess so, by Jinks!"

Then the colloquy ceased.

Sophronia hung up the listener; a thrill of horror run down her spine; what was about to happen at the Mills!

She had read a great many "story-papers," such as crowd our country post-offices and are scattered far and wide in farms and villages; papers full of sensation, of crime and adventure, of secret horrors suddenly revealed, of murders that "will out," regardless of the unities so dear to Mr. Vincent Crummles, and her weak brain had been fired with a vague, delightful, yet dreadful hope of experiencing some such reality. Here was her chance! It did occur to her once that she ought to interfere, to try and prevent a catastrophe; but it rained hard, the horses were gone, and what could she say to any legal official, even if she should reach one?

A brief spasm of sense rescued her; she only went about, as she expressed herself, "Goose-flesh all over," the rest of the day, having no living soul to confide in; for the great Cheshire boar had managed to break out of his stye early that forenoon and Hiram had to pursue him as best he might, nor did he return till two o'clock in the morning, even then without his pig; though he had driven it at last into a neighbor's barn by the seductive and odorous influence of certain early apples, irresistible to any pig of character.

Sophronia passed a troubled night. Her past enjoyment of the "penny dreadfuls" visited her now in the tangle of dreams, and whenever she woke it was to a shuddering recollection of Aaron Miller's savage voice and the impending fate of the unknown "he." But morning came at last, still dreary with howling winds and gusts of rain. Hiram had risen early, taken a cold bite and gone after his pig; and Sophronia, in the fashion of lonely women, made her scant breakfast, standing at the pantry shelf, of tea, and bread and butter, watching through the green-paned little window before her the draggled fowls picking their slow way through the wet mire of the barn-yard, uttering discomfited croaks about the weather, much like their fellows, the unfeathered bipeds. Suddenly the telephone rang; cup and saucer, bread and butter, fell from her hands. She made haste to seize the horn.

Within her ear the inevitable "Hullo!" resounded.

"That you, Aaron?"

"Tain't nobody else."

Little he knew that Sophronia heard it all.

"Well, have you did it?"

"Yes. He's done for."

"Where did you find him?"

"Snoopin' around the mill, as pop'lar as though he was inspector of b'lers."

"Haw, haw! What ye done with the remains?"

"They're deep' enough where nobody won't find 'em this hundred year."

"Him! that's good."

Sophronia dropped the horn; she stiffened with horror; here was a fearful murder right in the neighborhood! By then she had always expected it, or something like it, of those Miller's. While she stood considering, Hiram drove into the yard in a neighbor's wagon, the Cheshire boar lying ignominiously bound therein, squealing with all his piggish might. Hiram backed up against the stye, which he had reinforced at early dawn, and deftly slid Master Piggy over the tail-board, cutting his bonds as he helped him along, for well he knew the danger of setting such a captive free too soon.

He had just finished the risky proceeding when Sophronia appeared at the shed door with her apron over her head.

"H-i-ram!" she screamed. "I want ye to wait a minute! I've got to go in to Stanton. I must, right off. Won't Barber's folks let ye keep the team a spell?"

"I guess so," was the gruff response.

He knew perfectly well that he had borrowed the team to go to Stanton himself and get a scythe-snath. Such is man!

All the way Sophronia preserved an awful silence; she felt the magnitude of the situation and revolved her plans in her mind. What she did when she reached Stanton, after receiving proper advice in the matter, need not be detailed. In fact, I don't know what she did! But the very next morning Aaron and Joseph Miller were arrested on a charge of murder, and were brought before the proper authorities for preliminary examination.

There was Sophronia, too, who with much excitement and many needless words, deposed and testified to what she had heard on the telephone; a grim smile distorted Aaron Miller's face, and Joseph muttered, "The old fool!" under his breath; but it was only muttered, so Sophronia did not resent it.

Judge Stopcock was the model of a rural magnate; fat, red in the face, pompous, crowned with a sleek, brown wig, and a tall shiny hat, tilted slightly askew; he administered justice much as Mrs. Squeers administered brimstone and treacle, severely with a spoon. Throwing his head back, clasping his hands over his stomach, closing his eyes and pursing up his mouth he began his queries.

"And you, hum, the—ah, prisoners; what have you to offer as, hum, aw, rebuttal of Miss, ha, Perkins' statement?" Here he opened his eyes suddenly, and darted a judicial glare at the offenders.

"Nothin'!" growled Aaron. "I done it."

"O-o-oh!"

And with a delicious girlish scream a pretty, rosy, curly-headed girl rushed across the court-room, and flung her arms around Aaron Miller's neck; she had just come in at the door.

"He never!" she sobbed, addressing astounded Judge Stopcock with courageous scorn. "He never! he's the best and kindest and dearest man in the world."

Miss Sophronia prepared to faint.

"You shut up, Fan!" said Aaron, with a peremptory voice and a tender smile.

"Go ahead, Jedge! I killed 'him,' and I buried him! now I want the hull caboodle of ye to come along and dig him up, so's to hang me right off slick; and not be a-makin' no more fuss about it. Joe, did you send arter the team!"

"Yea-ah!" responded Joseph, with a wink, an undeniable wink! at the deputy sheriff, a bullet-headed Irishman, who had regarded the whole proceeding up to this time with subdued chuckles, as an exquisite joke.

Now Mike roared aloud with laughter.

"Silence!" shrieked the outraged Judge, growing redder than a turkey-cock.

"Well, come along," went on Aaron; "there's Slack's omnibus out of the door, and I want the hull posse commona us to come out an dig him up, as I said afore; there's spade's enough out there."

"Ye can han'cuff me and Joe, if you wanter."

This was a singular and improper proceeding, and the judge snorted and puffed a good deal about it; but in a rustic community the majority is apt to have its way, and nobody there believed Sophronia's accusation for an instant. Curiosity and rude justice swept the proprieties and Judge Stopcock into the corner.

Mike volunteered to sit between the prisoners with an arm locked in each of theirs on either side, and Fanny Manning, an orphan niece of the Millers, whom they had liberally supported and educated for the last five years, sat next her uncles.

Sophronia, too, went along; no prohibition of law or gospel would have deterred her now; the finale of this tragic business was at hand.

So judge, and sheriff, and prisoners, and witness, and as many of the crowd as could find room in the "omnibus," bowled away that calm September day to Millers' Mills, the women for once silent, the men talkative, so reversed for the time were their normal usages.

"Mis' Granger to hum?" asked the deputy sheriff.

"No, she ain't," replied Joseph; "she's gone for good 'n all. We hadn't an idee what sort of a piece she was till last week, though she's lived there nigh about three year. She done well by us, an' kep' her tracks covered up good; but murder will out. Case in p'int here, ye see."

Mike Flaherty choked down a laugh.

"So Aaron, he giv' her a walkin' ticket last week, and writ for Fan to come home to her old uncles and run the house, seein' she was fit an' prepared to leave school. That's why she's here; and Lyddy Ann, she quit day before yesterday."

In half an hour they drew up at the Mills, and Aaron, directing them where to find spades, led the awed and curious crowd right into the center of a cornfield, among the stacked harvest, and, pointing to a place where the sharp stubble and useless hills had been cleared away, said:

"Dig there."

How rapidly those spades were plied! how eagerly the little crowd watched for some startling discovery! how they all recoiled; and oh! how Mike Flaherty yelled with laughter when the busy spades revealed the stiff body of a great yellow cat!

"'Twas Lyddy Ann's Tommy," explained Joe. "She sot the world by him, and he sot all creation by our little Braymy chicks; but she wouldn't let nobody teach him; so, as soon as she cleared out, Aaron give him his send; and that's the hull on't."

"It is a lesson to the inquisitive female," said Judge Stopcock, again elevating his nose and shutting his eyes. "A lesson eminently needed by the sex to avoid listening surreptitiously, and passing unjustified judgment on the conduct of their fellow-men."

He darted a piercing glance at Sophronia; but she was gone. Her tragedy had vanished in thin air; the chorus of laughter with which the by-standers greeted the fall of Thomas, the cat, stung her to the core. She sneaked off across the lots to John's house, and the next day departed to the bosom of her brother's family, murmuring to herself:

"What made him call a cat 'He?'"

While Hiram, pining for pie and doughnuts in the void interim before John's marriage, more than once exclaimed to the regardless oxen, whom he lashed by way of emphasis:

"Blast them telephones!"—Rose Terry Cooke, in N. Y. Independent.

HOW TO COOK OATMEAL.

How It is Served in This Country and in "Auld Scotland."

In making oatmeal porridge, the meal is stirred into boiling water with a porridge stick, while the water is kept all the time at a brisk boil. Care should be taken to prevent the meal from forming knots, as it will do if dropped into the water in too large quantities. The best way is to take a handful of the meal and let it drop into the receptacle by the rubbing of the thumb against the fingers. At first the water will show ebullition or boiling up soon after the meal begins to go into it, and this will be kept up until about the time when enough of the meal has been added. Fine meal is more likely to knot than the coarse meal. It takes experience to tell when just the amount of meal needed has been used, the thickness of the porridge being the test. No measurement of water and meal will do. The oatmeal may be stirred in cold water before cooking, but this makes more labor and the cooking is not so well done as in the other way. But if the cold water mixing is resorted to, the meal should be ground to the finest flour.

If any other meal is mixed with oatmeal, as is sometimes done, rice meal is regarded as the best, though barley, bean, pea and wheat meals may be used. Only a small quantity of the rice meal should be used, but straight oatmeal would be preferred by the true lover of this cereal.

Acidity is developed when oatmeal is soaked in water for a few days, and this meal makes the "flummery" of the oatmeal districts of England, Scotland and Ireland.

Milk is used instead of water in making milk porridge; less meal is required, but more water. Ale is also used in place of water. Porridge is eaten mixed with milk. Cane syrup and butter are also used.

In making "water brose," boiling water is poured on a handful of oatmeal in a bowl, until the mess is of the thickness of porridge, and then some new milk is poured in. This is to be eaten immediately. Brose meal should be kiln dried and coarse. The art of making this dish lies in making the boiling water fully surround each particle of meal at the first pouring. Milk brose is made by using boiling milk; less meal is used than in water brose and about twice as much milk as water. In pouring the boiling liquid upon either water or milk brose, the meal is stirred to give it immediate cooking. When the liquid in which beef or mutton is boiled is used, beef or mutton brose is made, and even turnip and cabbage water is used.

White pudding is made of oatmeal with which minced suet and onions have been mixed, salt and pepper being used to taste. This may be done in a sauce-pan, but the mixture is more commonly stuffed into small intestines, cut into lengths of a foot or so, tied at both ends and boiled in a pot. It will keep for a year. Finally the water in which it is boiled is used in making pudding brose, that nothing may be lost. These are the ways in which oatmeal is cooked in "auld Scotland."—Good Housekeeping.

Forest Destruction in Russia.

According to the Moscow Viedomosti the banks of the Syr-Daria, not more than twenty years ago, were so thickly covered with woods that the operations of the Russian armies were thereby considerably impeded. So great, however, has been the destruction of timber in recent years that there are now extensive areas of from 5,000 to 8,000 square miles—notably around Perovsk, the old Ak-Metchet fortress—in the greatest want, not only of building material, but of ordinary brush firewood. To remedy this state of affairs several experienced foresters have been recently invited by General Rosenbach to visit Central Asia, and to take steps for the immediate formation of extensive plantations of young trees in this and other districts of Turkestan.

THE KNOCK ALPHABET.

A Means of Communication Resorted to by Russian Prisoners.

The talented Russian novelist X——, who has been twice exiled to Siberia and half a dozen times imprisoned, told me last summer that when he was arrested for the first time he had never even heard of the "knock alphabet;" and that when, during the second day of his imprisonment, he noticed a faint tapping on the other side of the wall, he regarded it merely as an indication that the adjoining cell was occupied, and gave it no particular attention. As the knocking continued, however, and as the faint taps seemed to be definitely segregated into groups by brief intervals of silence, he became convinced that his unknown neighbor was endeavoring to communicate with him. Upon what principal or plan the knocks were grouped he did not know, but he conjectured that the number of taps between two 'rests' might correspond with the serial number of a letter in the alphabet—one knock standing for 'a,' two for 'b,' three for 'c,' and so on up to twenty-six for 'z.' Upon putting this conjecture to the test he was delighted to find that the knocks resolved themselves into the letters 'D-o-y-o-u-u-n-d-e-r-s-t-a-n-d?' He replied with forty-nine knocks, so grouped and spaced as to make 'Y-e-s'; but long before he had finished this short word he became mournfully conscious that, at the rate of forty-nine knocks for every three letters, he and his unknown correspondent would not be able to exchange more than half a dozen ideas a week. The invisible prisoner on the other side of the wall did not seem, however, to be at all discouraged, and began at once another long series of knocks, which extended to two hundred and ninety-six, and which, when translated, made the words "Teach you better way—listen!" Mr. X—— then heard one loud tap near the corner of the cell, followed by the sound of scratching, which proceeded from that point towards the door at about the height of a man's head, as if the unknown were drawing a long horizontal line with some hard substance on the other side of the wall. After a brief interval of silence there came two staccato taps and the noise made by the scratching of a second line parallel with the first one, but a little lower down. When seven of these invisible lines had been drawn under one another about a foot apart, with a group of knocks at the beginning of each one to denote its number, the unseen artist went back to one knock, and proceeded to draw six perpendicular lines crossing the first series at right angles, so as to make a huge audible checker-board. As soon as Mr. X—— heard this invisible diagram, the purpose for which it was intended flashed upon his mind, and before the unknown instructor had finished knocking out the words, "Put alphabet in squares," the quick-witted pupil had scratched upon the floor of his cell a reduced copy of the audible tracing, and was numbering its lines and columns. His diagram when finished looked something like this:

	1	2	3	4	5
2	f	g	h	i	j
3	k	l	m	n	o
4	p	q	r	s	t
5	u	v	w	x	y
6	z

After giving Mr. X—— time to construct the figure, the unknown prisoner began another series of knocks, so grouped and spaced as to indicate the lines and columns in which the required letters were to be found. Five knocks followed by three knocks meant that the equivalent letter would be found at the intersection of the fifth line and third column: two knocks followed by one knock indicated letter 'f,' at the intersection of line two and column one; and five knocks followed by four knocks meant letter 'x,' at the intersection of line five, column four. The first question asked by the unknown was 53 23 35 11 43 15 55 35 51: "Who are you?" The prisoners then exchanged brief biographies, and Mr. X—— discovered that he had learned his a b c's and taken his first lesson in prison telegraphy from a common criminal—a burglar, if I remember rightly—who was awaiting exile to Siberia.—George Kennan, in Century.

A Red Top-Knot.

Two ladies were purchasing mufflers at the counter of a leading clothing store. Said one, turning to her friend:

"I am buying this for Albert D——. How do you like it?"

"Very handsome," returned the friend, admiringly, "but it is pink and Albert D—— has red hair! You must get a blue one."

"We are out of blue mufflers," said the obliging clerk, as he placed the pink one in a more inviting light.

"Red and pink can not go together," said the friend, decidedly.

"He—he—might dye his hair?" sug the clerk, facetiously.

"That's so," said the customer, with a sigh of relief, "I'll take it. I'm not responsible for his hair any way," she added, as she paid the bill.—Detroit Free Press.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—Submarine divers now use the electric light with considerable success.

—Dr. Scheuerlin, of Berlin, has inoculated dogs with the newly discovered bacillus of cancer. So far no cancer symptoms have been developed.

—The first recorded photograph of a rainbow has been exhibited to the Photographic Association of London. The arch has the appearance of something solid—like an arch of wood.

—A physician recommends that all the wood used in the interior construction of houses and all the plain surfaces of plaster should be thoroughly oiled or varnished so that the power of absorption of foul air and gases may be destroyed.

—It is estimated that pin factories in New England turn out 10,800,000,000 pins yearly and that other factories in the States bring the number up to 18,000,000,000. This is equal to about one pin a day for every inhabitant of the United States.

—The nettle is among the substances which science has put to use during the past few years. This weed is even being cultivated in Germany, its fiber having proven valuable for a variety of textile fabrics. In Dresden a thread is produced from it so fine that a length of sixty miles weighs only two and a half pounds.

—At a late meeting in London, Dr. E. P. Thwing stated that Americans are more susceptible to the influence of alcohol than Englishmen, and that they are more affected by tobacco than the Hollanders, Turks or Chinese. This he supposes to be due to an increased sensitiveness of the nervous system, induced by the high-pressure life of this country.

—What has been designated as "The Savagery of Boyhood" has become a subject for scientific investigation. There seems to be a division of opinion on the subject. Some hold that a boy is naturally and inherently a savage, while others contend that his savagery is more owing to false education and the evil example of adults than to his own inborn nature. We are inclined to the opinion that each of these theories has some truth in it.

—Gum tragacanth is collected from plants in Asia Minor, the greater part being shipped from Smyrna. Formerly only what exuded spontaneously was gathered, but now the flow of the gum is aided and induced by incisions near the root, and the product is the fine, white, flaky variety, so much valued in commerce. The flow takes place during the night, and the hot and dry weather is the most favorable period.

—Gastro-intestinal catarrh, with a disordered condition of the nervous system and considerable depression, is the usual result following the ingestion of poisonous fungi. In treating these cases the stomach and bowels must be thoroughly emptied, and the prominent symptons are to be relieved according as they occur. After free vomiting and purgation have been induced, rest in bed, with stimulants and warmth, are beneficial.

—It appears that special attention is being paid in France and England to a more general substitution of iron and steel for wood, wherever practicable, in manufactured articles, such, for instance, as building materials, boxes and packing cases, barrels or casks, carriages or carts, and other vehicles, furniture, fencing, railway work, sheds, signal boxes, telegraph poles, etc. In France there have recently come in use hollow-iron window frames and doors, which are said to be light and strong and of far greater durability than could ever be assumed of wood. There is no reason, too, it is thought, why corrugated barrels of iron or steel should not be used for liquors, since milk and preserved fruits and other articles are kept in cans. Steel is finding much favor among carriage builders, but there is still much prejudice against the metal being used in the manufacture of furniture.

LUCK IN A HUMP.

A Singular Superstition Prevailing Among Professional Gamblers.

"I will let you rub my hump with your gold if you give me a franc," said a hump-backed girl to me one night in the gambling saloon at Monte Carlo. I looked at her somewhat astonished at the remark, but she seemed so much in earnest and so desirous of the small piece of money that I gave it to her and rubbed her hump for luck, put the money on 14 and—lost. It was the strangest piece of tipping that I ever encountered in all my European travels, yet there are three or four hump-backs who are habitues of the gambling saloon at Monte Carlo, and who make a living by letting the superstitious rub their lucky hump with money.

I remember an experience once in America of the same kind, but it was not for a tip that the hump was rubbed. A friend once told me to rub the hump of a hunchback with money, not letting him see you do it, and it was good luck. It was race week and I thought I would try it; so, slipping up behind a little hunchback who was going through the corridor of a prominent hotel in Washington, I pretended to be taking off my coat, and, having money in my hand, accidentally, as it were, let that hand hit the hunchback, and thus rub the money on the lucky hump. But, alas! the man turned around and I had to apologize for thus seemingly assaulting him.

Of course I knew then that no luck would come from the contact of the money with the hump, and so did not put any on the races and perhaps saved by it. But at Monte Carlo it seems to be reversed, for you, with the knowledge of the unfortunate, rub your money up against them, and very often, at least they tell me so, the person wins.—*Cor. FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Make a little land rich, and there will be no need to scratch over a large farm.

—The question is not what could be done if we had certain other things, but what can we do to make the most of what we have.

—A sheep well fed and protected during the winter will yield in the spring two pounds more of wool than one that has been half starved.

—When butter is gathered in the churn in granular form, it is never overchurned. Pounding it after it is in a lump or large mass is what overchurns it.

—Warm water put in the cellar on cold nights to prevent freezing, should be in closed vessels, which warm up the air, making it dryer without evaporating moisture into it.

—Green Sponge Cake: Two teacups of sugar, one of cream, two of flour, four eggs, one teaspoonful of baking powder and one teaspoonful extract lemon; bake quickly.

—Never set the lamp upon a red table-cover; if you can not find time to make a green lamp-mat, put a piece of green card-board under the lamp, and you will find the reflection upon your work much more agreeable to the eyes than that from the red cover.

—Creamed Apples:—Pare your fruit and either scald or bake it until sufficiently soft to pulp it through a colander; sweeten to taste, fill your glasses three parts full with it, then plentifully sprinkle in some powdered cinnamon, put a good layer of rich whipped cream on the top and sift white sugar over it.

—A little meal stirred into a pail of water gives it a relishable flavor, and induces a cow to drink more, besides affording some additional nourishment. If the temperature of the water is first raised to seventy or eighty degrees, it is all the better, since the cow will drink more warm water than she will cold.

—To prepare zante currants for cake, put them in a colander, set the colander in a large pan of water, and unless there are stones in, the sand and stems will all settle in the pan. If you wash the currants thoroughly in this way, you will be surprised at the results, as it takes less time and water than in the old way, and it is so much easier to rub them clean.

—The bones of a well-bred, well-fed hog are said to present only about one-twentieth part of his gross weight. An animal of this nature must necessarily carry a great deal of fat, but the importance of making it well muscled to keep it from complete degeneracy is self-evident to any thoughtful person; uence, inasmuch as the natural tendency of the hog is to fat, feeders should make it a point to counteract the evil by using the most nutritious feed to the exclusion of fat-forming food.

—It would hardly pay the farmer to engage in the poultry business beyond the keeping of two or three dozen fowls for family use, unless there should be some one about the place who would make it a special business to look after the poultry and like to do it. Sometimes the service of a good, steady boy, who is a natural fancier, may be secured at a small cost, and all of his time may be profitably employed in caring for 200 or 300 hens, or, if he be experienced, probably 500 or 600. In embarking in the business it is best not to start out on too large a scale.

CAPACITY OF FARMS.

A Subject Which Should be Carefully Studied by Agriculturists.

Every farmer should study the capacity of his farm, so as to be able to turn its resources to the best account.

Some farms are naturally adapted to grass production, and can be made to produce heavy crops of hay yearly for a long time. Other farms soon run out when seeded to grass, but are good for cropping. On such farms a large area should be ploughed yearly, cropped and fertilized, and seeded down. For a few years good crops of grass can be obtained, and then the land needs reseeding. The aim on such farms should be to have from one-third to one-half of the tillage under the plow all the time, so that the grass land will all be newly seeded, and the farmer will be able to re-plow as soon as the grass begins to run out.

Then there are farms that are rocky and rough. The soil is stony and fertile, but is not adapted to cultivation. Apple-trees, perhaps, will thrive with remarkable vigor on such land, and the farmer should accept the indication, and plant it to apple-trees until he has all he can take care of. A man in East Winthrop, Me., had a farm of that character. It was of little value for tillage, but he found that the Roxbury russet throve remarkably well, and produced excellent fruit. He "took the hint," and set his farm largely to Roxbury russet trees until nearly thirty acres were covered. Now, in some years, he sells $2,000 worth of fruit. He has made a rocky and almost worthless farm one of the most valuable in town, simply because he used it for the purpose to which it was best adapted.

That is what the farmer should try to do; study the capabilities of his farm, and then try so to manage it that he will draw out of it the best that it is capable of affording. It will not do to manage farms all in one way, on account of the great diversity in soils and physical conditions.—Cor. N. Y. Examiner.

A FEMALE BANDIT.

One of the Most Remarkable Women Ever Produced by Mexico.

The death is announced of one of the most remarkable women that Mexico has ever produced. Notwithstanding her strange and perilous career she attained a ripe old age and became one of the wealthiest women in the Republic. This woman was Senora Amastia Rubio de Pascadero. In her early womanhood she devoted her time to robbery, and if half the reports regarding her career are true it is no wonder that she left a vast fortune at her death. One of her most notable exploits was a stage robbery in the State of Zacatecas.

One night she dressed herself in men's clothing, and mounting a horse rode from the little town of San Antonio to the Zacatecas and Aques Calantes stage road, where she waited in a small mesquite grove for the south-bound stage to pass. As the postillions came up she commanded them with a revolver in hand to halt, put out their torches and fall into the rear of the coach, which was a few yards behind them. She then advanced upon the driver and keeper, who were made to dismount, expecting every moment to be shot from ambush, as she kept saying, "Don't shoot unless they offer resistance."

The passengers, eight in number, who were inside the stage were led to believe from the female road agent's conversation that an armed party was in the brush, and when she came up and demanded their money, watches and jewelry they lost no time in obeying her. She then bade the passengers good-night, and after admonishing them not to make a movement within half an hour disappeared in the grove. During her career she killed a great many men, and for many long years was a terror to the people of Sinaloa, Jalisco and Sonora.. Troops and State police chased her for years, but could never entrap her. It was stated that the reason she gave for adopting such a remarkable mode of life was the murder by Federal troops of her intended husband years ago, when she was in her teens. She then made a vow that she would kill or ruin five men for every year she should be permitted to live. She was one of the most desperate bandits Mexico ever produced, notwithstanding she was a woman. Before her death she related her strange history and bequeathed her immense fortune to charities. At her request she was buried beside her dead lover in her native town, San Antonio.—Nogales (N. T.) Letter.

A TALE-TELLING CROW.

Evidence Showing That Birds Possess a Limited Language.

Among birds there is a universally understood signal of danger. In some cases it is the shrill scream of the swallow and swift; in others the repeated despairing cry of the thrush and blackbird; or it may be the hiss of the tomtit and wryneck; the "pink, pink" of the chaffinch; the "cluck cluck" of the farmyard hen; but wherever or whenever it is heard all the feathered tribe instantly seek some place of refuge. But quite apart from this well known warning there are numerous instances which seem to be conclusive that birds also communicate their ideas to each other. One day, while sitting hidden in the garden, I observed a crow fly to a wood-pigeon's nest, which was in a tree close above me and bring forth from it one of their eggs which was hard set. Carrying it in his beak he flew to a neighboring tree and proceeded to pull out the young one from the shell and eat it slowly. Presently another crow came sailing along on leisurely wing, and seeing what was happening, he alighted beside the thief, who must have explained everything very clearly, as, after a minute or two, the new-comer flew straight to the wood-pigeon's nest, which was well hidden in the tree, and, notwithstanding the cries and resistance of the parent birds, he soon appeared with the second egg, which he ate with much relish on the grass a short distance from me.—Little Folks.

Some Facts About Hogs.

"Hogs are the most unprofitable stock we keep as now managed, that is, when fed for fourteen months," says Prof. Sanborn. The growth and weight attained by hogs in fifteen or eighteen months may be obtained at much less cost at seven or eight months. Those who feed hogs for fourteen months actually waste by unnecessary maintenance 45 per cent. of the food given after the hog is eight or nine months old. This is an extravagance no farmer can afford. As hogs near maturity the cost of their dead weight rapidly advances. The old belief that hogs of 150 to 200 pounds and upward will make growth more cheaply than smaller animals is a false one. The 350-pound hog takes nearly twice as much food for a pound of gain as does a fifty-pound pig. These figures ought to banish from the farm every shote over eight or nine months old.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

SHE WENT ASTRAY.

Seeking Afar What May Be Found at One's Own Fireside.

The invalid proprietress of a wealthy estate in Scotland once visited the continent of Europe to get rid of her maladies.

She went to Baden-Baden and tried those celebrated waters, then to Carlsbad and tried its mineral springs. She got worse instead of better, and in despair she said to a physician:

"What shall I do?"

His reply was: "Medicine can do nothing for you. You have one chance, in the waters of Pit Kealthly, Scotland!"

"Is it possible!" she replied, "why, those waters are on my own estate!"

Invalids go tramping over the world, unsuccessfully seeking the relief that often lies right at their own doors.

Change of climate and travel is no doubt beneficial in some classes of disease, but it is impossible to secure, while traveling, the proper care and nursing, the cheerful comforts of home, which are often necessary adjuncts to medicine in promoting recovery.

In many ailments arising, as so many do, from derangements of these primary organs, the kidneys and liver, with the proper remedy to use, recovery is much more rapid at one's own fireside.

Major S. B. Abbott, of Springfield, Mo., was attacked with serious troubles, and after a long course of medical treatment, tried to find relief at Hardin Sulphur Springs in California, and visited a number of other noted health resorts, but all to no purpose. At last he went home—he was induced to try Warner's safe cure for his kidney troubles, and soon became a well man.

Dr. Gustav Weber, a leading physician of Dessau, Germany, writes Warner's safe cure Co.'s branch at Frankfort: Sept. 12th, 1887: "For many years I have suffered from inflammation of the kidneys, and each year was obliged to visit Carlsbad for temporary relief. I have finished my fifteenth bottle of Warner's safe cure and have completely recovered."

The main thing is to find the right remedy, then recovery from all the many ailments that are the result of kidney derangement is most easily secured at home surrounded by home comforts. There are few diseases for which travel is, on the whole, beneficial, but there are many which may be cured by putting the kidneys in a healthy state, thus driving the cause of the disease from the system.

"Yes, Lizzie, I like to do fancy work, but I haven't felt like trying that pattern—or anything else—for a week. These awful 'dragging-down' pains are just killing me!" "I know how you feel, and I can tell you where to look for relief. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a certain cure for all those peculiar weaknesses and distressing ailments. Why! it even cured me of prolapsus, and many of my lady friends have been cured of various grave maladies peculiar to our sex by this wonderful medicine." It is the only medicine sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. Read guarantee on bottle-wrapper.

Very Sensible "Japs."

In Japan the old-school physicians are permitted to wear only wooden swords. This is a gently sarcastic way of expressing the opinion that they kill enough people without using weapons. But the druggist who introduced Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery into the Empire, carries a fine steel blade. It was found that all who tried this wonderful remedy for coughs, colds, consumptive tendencies, blood, skin and liver troubles, were, without exception, greatly benefited. The Mikado himself is said to have "toned up" his system by its use, and the importer was therefore permitted the exceptional honor of wearing the sword of the nobility.

Westward, the Course of Empire, Etc.

We all know the quotation, but many emigrants westward-bound do not know that upon their arrival they will have to encounter that invisible foe of the frontiersman—malaria. They should take an ample supply of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters along. Not only is it a certain safeguard against every form of malarial disease, but it eradicates liver complaint, constipation, dyspepsia, nervousness and rheumatism.

that catarrh will in time wear out. The theory is false. Men try to believe it because it would be pleasant if true, but it is not, as all know. Do not let an acute attack of cold in the head remain unsubdued. It is liable to develop into catarrh. You can rid yourself of the cold and avoid all chance of catarrh by using Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. If already afflicted rid yourself of this troublesome disease speedily by the same means. Limited Express Trains—Five Hours Saved Going West or Southwest via Chicago to Council Bluffs or Kansas City.

The "GREAT ROCK ISLAND ROUTE" has adopted a fast-time schedule which guarantees a rate of speed between above named points heretofore unattained in Western railroading. Its "Council Bluffs and Pacific Limited Express" leaves Chicago daily at 7:30 P. M., and arrives in Council Bluffs at 11:30 A. M. next day. This is a magnificent train, including Pullman palace sleepers (price of berths greatly reduced) and dining cars. The "Kansas City and Pacific Limited Express" leaves daily at 5 P. M., and arrives in Kansas City at 9:05 A. M. next day. The equipment of this train is also superior and unsurpassed, consisting (in addition to first-class day coaches) of new and elegant reclining chair cars and Pullman palace sleeping (berths at reduced rates) and buffet cars. Speed, safety, comfort and luxury have long been recognized as characteristics of the Rock Island, and, more than ever, are these traits now exemplified in its fast train service, which guarantees a delightful journey, consuming only sixteen hours' time between Chicago and Council Bluffs or Kansas C.y. At both these points connections are made (in union depots) with fast trains running through to California and all points on the Pacific coast.

WHAT IT IS.
1st. It is in one word a cure; it is not merely a relief and in no sense a cure-all; it is the product of scientific research.
2d. It strengthens while it soothes and subdues, heals and cures; it literally conquers pain.
3d. Its effects are curative and permanent to the whole group of muscular miseries and nervous agonies.
4th. It does not merely irritate the outer surface, nor does it merely soften or relax a constricted muscle. To its specific action a superior curative virtue is superadded.
5th. It penetrates deeply but gently; searchingly and surely, seeking the pain spot in an effort to conquer.
6th. Each constituent of the formula has a recognized intrinsic virtue to serve most surely the cure of pain.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skilful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Large bottles (100 doses) $1.00, or six bottles for $5.00.

Legislative Notes.

No new local bills for Garrett county have been introduced since our last issue. A number of those already noted have been advanced, and two or three have passed both houses and only await the signature of the Governor to become laws.

Senator Browning arrived at his home in Oakland Friday evening of last week, quite unwell, but so far recovered that he returned to Annapolis Wednesday morning. Mr. Peddicord, clerk to the committee of which Mr. Browning is chairman, came home Saturday night and left for Annapolis Monday morning.

In the Senate Tuesday a Committee on Temperance was announced, with Mr. Browning as chairman.

Petitions were largely signed in Oakland this week protesting against the bills reducing the fees of State's Attorney and Sheriff. These petitions were signed by about all the prominent men of both political parties in Oakland. They are generally of the opinion that if these bills should be come laws, the spirit if not the letter of the constitution, which provides that the salary or compensation of officers shall not be increased or diminished during their term of service, would be violated.

The bill for the appointment of a treasurer for this county, meets with general disapprobation, especially that provision which requires every tax payer to come to Oakland to pay his or her taxes.

The bill for the appointment of school commissioners by the Governor, also meets with disfavor. The feeling is general with well informed people that the present excellent Board should remain, at least, until certain financial matters are settled.

A Plea for the Old Soldier in his Withheld Dues.

JANUARY 30th, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—Some of our statesmen appear a great deal exercised over the question what ought to be done with the surplus revenue now in the National Treasury—about $55,000,000. They appear to believe, or affect to believe, that it is a source of great national evil. They are ready to trace any little imagined disorder in our national economy to this fact, though the present surplus is much smaller than in times past, when it was regarded by all reasonable people as proof of high prosperity and real wealth, and which no other nation on earth could lay claim to. These melancholy statesmen act and talk as though their country did not have a creditor in the world. Is this so? Not by any means. It is true it is not pressed or in default, but there are obligations of many millions; legal, equitable and honorable, which ought to be met at once. Most prominent among them are the pension arrearages due the old soldiers of the late war, their widows, minor children and dependent parents.

At the beginning of the war, to induce and stimulate enlistments, Congress passed laws offering bounties to volunteers, and also pensions to all who might be wounded in the service, as well as the widows and dependent relatives who might fall in defence of their country. These pension laws are absolute on their face, without any conditions, and promise to protect all who properly come within their provisions. More than two million soldiers entered our armies under these laws, and no one can now say how many of these patriots would have remained at home had not these assurances been given. They were the very essence of the contract of enlistment between the soldier and their government. The promised pension formed the consideration in such contract, and thus became vested rights of the soldiers, and an irrevokable obligation on the part of the government. The constitution forbids the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of a contract or vested right. Can Congress pass such a law? Surely they ought not.

There was nothing in these original pension laws requiring claimants to file their claims by or within any given time. The sharpest and more intelligent of these beneficiaries came forward, promptly demanded and obtained their full rights. Many of the slower and ill-informed held back, and others have, for a time, felt too proud or well-to-do to ask of the government, especially in its straights, for their just dues.

Some years after the close of the war Congress passed one or more laws limiting the payment of pensions from the time the claims should be filed in the Pension Office, in lieu of the time when the right of pension first accrued—that is to say from the discharge or death of the soldier. In 1879, per chap. 187, Congress saw the wrong of these limitations or restrictions, and passed what was known as the arrearages act, carrying the pay back to the beginning of the right, thus equalizing and putting all pensioners on the same footing up to July 1, 1880. But this act, by its own provisions, ceased to have effect after that date, so all claims filed since then only carry pay from the date of application.

Had not these meritorious beneficiaries a right to trust in the faith and stipulations of their government which, by their valor they saved, and withhold their claims if they saw proper, and present them at such times as suited them, without the risk of forfeiture? The truth is these acts of Congress taking away from the disabled soldiers large parts of their legal rights, are simply acts of confiscation, not against the enemies of our country, but its benefactors, the very ones Congress by solemn laws promised to protect and reward. Confiscation laws were passed during the war against those in armed hostilities against their country and its laws, but even these were very tenderly and mildly enforced—hardly at all. More than fifteen years of the first pay of pensioners who filed their claims since July 1, 1880, stands today forfeited, and it might be said repudiated by acts of Congress. It is not doubtful whether the Supreme Court would hold such legislation unconstitutional?

The pension laws in reference to the late war rest upon quite differept principles from those of any former wars. Such laws were enacted by Congress, pensioning the old soldiers of the Revolutionary war, also that of 1812 and the Mexican, but these laws were acts of gratitude, long after the wars to which they applied were over, and there was no congressional promises or contracts at or before enlistment—no plighted faith with the soldiers in those days, who took their lives in hand to make or save a country. Is it right or fair to give pensions to some since 1862, '63 or '64, and to others only since 1880, with the same merit? What more than mere statement of the facts could be wanted by those who have it in their power, and whose duty it is, to render complete justice to those who have only received partial justice. A few millions of your troublesome surplus can be gracefully and wisely parted with for this purpose.

But we are in the habit of hearing much about pension frauds. No doubt occasionally a fraudulent claim does pass through the Pension Office, and still more frequently cases without sufficient merit, but nearly all have some merit. But on the other hand a great many more worthy claims are rejected for the want of the technical and strict proof, required by the Pension Office. The government through all its Departments are constantly paying improper claims unknowingly, and the same thing takes place in all relations of life. Are we for these reasons to ignore justice, distroy government and disorganize society? I rather think not. Let justice and fairness be aimed at, and if errors now and then occur on the side of generosity, let it be so.

It is proper to state that Senator Ingalls has introduced a bill in the Senate for the purpose of removing the restrictions refered to. It is to be hoped it will be passed into a law, and thus equalize the intended benefits of the original pension laws.

DEFENDER OF THE RIGHT.

Electricity is apparently to become the executioner of the future. The commissioner appointed by the New York legislature in 1886 to make inquiry and report as to "the most humane and practical method" for the execution of criminals convicted of capital crimes, has submitted a report to the legislature of that state now in session. The method recommended is the killing of the doomed culprits by an electric shock. It is instaneous, absolutely certain, and entirely painless.

A resolution providing for an amendment to the State constitution forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, has passed the Massachusetts Senate by a vote of 28 to 8. The measure is a prohibition of liquor as a beverage, For the arts and medicinal purposes it is to be continued. The Republican caucus of the lower House has voted to approve the measure, by a vote of 127 to 30.

The Baltimore Sun is engaged in the commendable enterprise of booming Maryland's climate and resources with a view to attracting immigrants. This is done in a series of compactly written articles, devoted to the various counties. Garrett's appeared Friday of last week and was as follows:

Garrett, the last formed of the Maryland counties, is located in the extreme western portion of the State. It contains on area of six hundred and seventy square miles of territory with a population (census of 1880) of 12,175. The registered vote of the county is 2,974, which indicates that the popolation has materially increased since the last census.

The Great Savage mountain, better known as the backbone of the Alleganies, crosses the county from north to south. On the east side of the mountain is the Maryland coal basin, about one-third of which is in Garrett county. On the western side of the backbone, and lying between that and Meadow mountain, at an elevation of two thousand five hundred feet above tidewater, is a vast tableland covering an area of four hundred square miles, one third of which is glade land, and is unquestionably the finest portion of the State for grazing and stock raising. There is, perhaps, no county in the State which contains such valuable mineral deposits in coal and iron ore. Fire clay and limestone of a superior quality abound also.

The soil is a dark rich loam, which is very productive, and readily yields 25 bushels of wheat, 40 bushels of oats, 40 to 60 bushels of corn or 200 bushels of potatoes per acre without fertilizers. The soil which is naturally good, is easily improved, and a coat of lime acts like a charm upon it. The country is sparsely settled, and there is, therefore, a great deal of uncultivated and unimproved land, much of which is for sale. Unimproved lands may be bought in large or small tracts at prices ranging from three to ten dollars per acre, whilst improved farms command from ten to thirty dollars per acre.

Notwithstanding the natural productiveness of the soil and the numerous other advantages possessed by the early settlers, they paid very little attention to agriculture beyond the raising of a little buckwheat, oats and a few potatoes. In later years, however, the forests are being cleared out, farms opened up, and a large number of the most intelligent and best citizens of the country are turning their attention to farming as a business, and are growing in addition to the crops raised by their predecessors large crops of wheat and corn, and in addition to these wool, maple sugar, and butter are produced in large quantities annually.

Facilities for reaching markets are ample in all parts of the county. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad runs through the southern portion of the county from east to west for a distance of thirtry miles. On the southwestern border runs the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg Railroad for a distance of thirty miles or more. On the east is the Cumberland and Pennsylvania Railroad, and the National turnpike road traverses the northern portion of the county for a distance of twenty miles. The northern part of the county has access to the Pittsburg and Connessville Railroad, a branch of which runs to Salisbury, which is located very near the Maryland and Pennsylvania line. The large numbers of towns along the railroads, and especially those along George's creek, in the mining region, furnish good markets for nearly all the produce raised in the county. Improvements in labor-saving machinery and farming implements are keeping pace with the general advance all along the agricultural line, and nearly every farmer is provided with reapers, mowers and grain-drills, as well as the latest improved plows, harrows and other utensils. Stock-raising is one of the leading industries, and the farmers and graziers are constantly introducing new breeds of animals for the purpose of improving their stock.

Manufactures in Garrett county do not amount to a great deal, and are limited to two or three woolen factories, about the same number of tanneries, and a few lumber mills, which turn out various kinds of lumber, shingles, laths, shooks, staves, &c. The future of this county probably lies in its capacity for agricultural products, and not in its prospect of becoming a manufacturing community. The time is not distant when this will be a great agricultural county. The amount of mercantile business done annually in the towns of the county would probably reach the sum of $200,000.

One of the most interesting features in this connection is the opportunity afforded to industrious and steady immigrants and farmers of small means to procure homes for themselves and families. The sparsely settled condition of the county, the large amount of unimproved land for sale, the productiveness of the soil, the facilities for reaching market, coupled with the advantages of climate, offer special advantages to settlers.

A Maryland Republican Talks.

New York Press, Jan. 27th.

Hon. Lloyd Lowndes, one of the leading Republicans of Maryland, was one of the arrivals at the St. James Hotel last night. Mr. Lowndes, though yet a comparatively young man, is one of the best posted men in that section of the South, and has for many years occupied a prominent place in the councils of his party on both local and national questions. Mr. Lowndes said last night that while the chances of a Republican victory in his State were by no means brilliant he thought they would come nearer to it next fall than they have for a number of years.

"I think," he added, "we made a mistake last fall in practically giving up our fight for the Governorship after we were beaten in the Mayorality canvass in Baltimore. We had a fair chance to win then and we should have continued the fight for all it was worth."

"Do you think the Republicans are likely to carry any Southern State next fall?"

"Yes, I think there is an excellent chance of carrying Virginia. You see the position of the Republican party in relation to the tax on tobacco is very popular in Virginia and will tend to draw a large vote with it. If any Southern State casts its electoral vote for the Republican candidate I think Virginia will be the one."

"Who is the choice of your State for the Republican nomination?"

"Mr. Blaine seems to have the call. A number of our people were converted to the Blaine ranks during the recent Convention of Republican Clubs held in this city. Sherman is a good man. If he was not so cold in his nature and had the power of enthusing the masses like Mr. Blaine has, he could not be beaten; but he does not seem to get a hold on the popular heart. I can't say whom I favor, but I am inclined to think some well known man whose name has not been actively canvassed should be chosen."

Disgusted Settlers.

RICHMOND, VA, Jan. 30.—"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good," remarked Virginia legislator when he heard a report of the State Commissioner of Agriculture read in the General assembly on Saturday. The latter official who succeeded to this office on the first of the present month, says that since then he has read a large number of letters from people outside of Virginia making inquiries for homes here. The letters come especially from the great northwestern section of the Union, where an icy blizzard has recently played such sad havoc.

Most of them ask for reports, maps and statistical information in regard to agricultural, industrial, manufacturing and mining interests of Virginia, The Commissioner adds: These inquiries come from American-born citizens of the now frozen Northwest, men with means and families seeking homes singly and in companies, and being satisfied that the vicissitudes of climate in the Northwest will drive and is driving the better part of the population of that section South, and that this class of settlers is greatly needed in Virginia. I make this report that your body may take any action you deem proper in the premises.

The report was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and it is believed, if the advantages of the State can be fairly advertised, that immigration will not only be attracted from the Northwest, but can be diverted here from Europe.

Trade Review.

NEW YORK, Jan. 27.—R. G. Dun & Co., in their weekly review, say:

Iron is perceptibly sustained in price for the time by the enforced curtailment of production, but the feeling prevails, that resumption of work in the local mines may be followed by lower prices of iron. In all branches of this great industry the decrease in railroad demand is felt.

A better tone in the steel market has been observed within two days, but the business is still mainly left to speculators, and the inability of promoters to place securities may retard new railway building for some time to come, though current reports still show large gross earnings. The storms, the strikes, and the recent disagreements about rates may be felt a little later.

There is a better movement in wool but quotations average a little lower. Cotton is unchanged, while prices of many makes of bleached and brown goods and fancy prints have been advanced, and print cloths are quoted at $3.94 for 64s. The boot and shoe business is fairly active, with shipments exceeding last year, and prices of almost all kinds of leather favoring buyers.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30, 1888.—A ripple of amusement has been caused here by the publication of a letter written by Senator Ingalls three weeks after Cleveland's inauguration, in which he pays Cleveland some compliments. About that time there were a great many Republicans who would have written similar letters, so completely were they humbugged by Cleveland's professions of civil service reform, but now that his character is more fully known and understood, he stands in the eyes of observant people as the representative of the spoils system, and his administration will stand in history as having removed more officials on account of their political opinions than any other one in the history of the country; and these removals have been steadily going on while this arrant political fraud was repeating "No man shall be removed on account of his political opinions" and other such catch phrases. The publication of this old Ingalls letter was doubtless intended to help Cleveland but it is more likely to prove a boomerang.

For the first time, Cleveland was seen on foot on the streets of this city, Saturday, when accompanied by Secretary Fairchild he walked to West Washington and returned. A short distance behind them walked two detectives, to see that nobody should hurt the "dear innocent little things." Bah. It's enough to make one sick to even think of it, particularly when it is remembered that when Gen. Grant was President he made a regular practice of walking about the city alone; and it would have been a very reckless man who would have dared to suggest to the brave old warrior that he should be followed by detectives to protect him from his fellow citizens. But it's a long ways from Grant to Cleveland: one was the real man of the people; the other is a bogus representative of the people, who tries to palm himself off on the masses as a great reformer.

That "Republics are ungrateful" was never more strikingly shown than in the case of the survivors of Lieut. Greeley's expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, who have not to this day received from the Government their regular allowance for fuel and quarters. If they had been on some easy duty at home, they would doubtless have long ago received their allowances; but their absence in the Arctic seas and the form of the order detailing them, made an act of Congress necessary to authorize their payment. A bill was reported to the Senate in the last Congress, and easily passed, but it was defeated in the House, through the efforts of General Bragg (now minister to Mexico) solely because it was reported from the committee on claims instead of from the military committee. A bill has alaeady been introduced in the Senate this session to give Brainard and his brave comrades their pay, which amounts to about $700 for each of them. Senator Manderson made the report on this bill, in which he said: "The appeal of these men is not only just, with precedent in support of it, but the heroism exhibited and the hardships endured by the petitioners should have stimulated earlier action as an evidence of a desire on the part of the representatives of the American people to reward those who were willing to sacrifice their lives and their health in the cause of science. Justice hes been tardy. Fourteen of the nineteen persons named in this bill ard dead, and at the rate of progress which their prayer for relief has, all may be deceased before any action is taken.

Think of a report like that being made in the Senate. And yet it may be years before the heirs of these brave men get their money.

Hon. S. V. White, of New York, has introduced a bill that will strike many people favorably, in view of the rapid rate at which our forests are being destroyed. His bill proposes to seperate the forest lands from the other public lands of the United States, to withdraw them from the control of the General Land Office, and to put them under the special care of the Commissioner of Forests and four Assistant Commissioners, with the view of having the forest lands cultivated and preserved.

Senator Vance, of North Carolina, does not agree with Cleveland that the internal revenue tax is sacred, and must not be touched. In a speech in the Senate the other day he said:

"So far as they affect my people there is cause of complaint against each as to the tax itself, but far more as to the method of collection against the revenue taxes. So great offense has this system given to the people of North Carolina that they have again and again, through their accredited political agencies, demanded its total repeal. Now, why should not this tax be repealed? The emergency which called it into existence has long since passed away.

Protection at the South.

LYNCHBURG, VA., Jan. 24.—The report that the duty on soft coal and iron ore will be repealed in the approaching tariff biil has aroused all the mineral section of this State and of West Virginia, and meetings are being held almost daily to protest against removing this duty. One of these meetings held last Saturday in this State represented over 1,500 miners, and a like meeting in West Virginia included as many laborers supperted by this industry, the number in each case being as large, or larger, shan the Democratic majority in each State.

The first of these meetings was held at Pocahontas, Virginia, and was called by the miners and mine laborers and other employees in the mines of the Southwest Virginia Improvement Company, employing over 1,700 men. After appointing J. Roach, chairman and H. M. Smythe secretary, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, Upon the successful mining and ehipping of soft coal and production of iron ore depends the living of thousands of people in this section, the security of many hundred thousands of dollars of invested capital and the developement of the richest coal area in the world; and

WHEREAS, The present duty on soft coal, etc., is only sufficient to guarantee to the operators, handlers and shippers a narrow margin of profit, after allowing fair wages to the miner and mine laborer; therefore be it

Resolved, By the citizens of East Tazewell, in mass meeting assembled, that we view with the liveliest alarm the preposition to remove the duty on soft coal and coke, and foresee in the adoption of such a measure the swift and inevitable destruction of the coal interests in our section, and the consequent defeat of all measures looking to the developement of this part of Virginia.

Resolutions were also passed favoring "the repeal of the odious and un-American system of internal taxation, which would be perpetuated by the proposed tariff reduction," asking a hearing before the Committee of Ways and means and urging the Senators and Representatives from Virginia to vote against the proposed repeal.

The meeting held on the same day at Bramwell, in Mercer county, West Virginia, was called by the operators and miners of Cooper & Co., Caswell Creek Coal and Coke Company, William Booth & Co., and Goodwin & Co., employing in all 1,500 men. The meeting, of which J. O. Welsh was chosen chairman, and C, H. Dahring, Jr., Secretary, passed the following resolution, after reciting the danger of a repeal of the duty on soft coal or coke:

Resolved, That we, the citizens, operators, miners and mine laborers representing the Flat Top Coal and Coke District, at present producing 3,000 tons of coal and 500 tons of coke per day, with large promises of increase in the future, earnestly represent that the removal of the duties on soft coal and coke would be ruinous to the interests of our section, and respectfully request that the members of the House of Representatives and Senators from West Virginia use all legitimate means to defeat any measure looking to the removal or diminution of the present duties on soft coal and coke.

The usual demand for a hearing before the committee was also made, and steps taken to organize a common movement through the State to agitate against the repeal of these duties.

Negroes Anxious to Emigrate.

KANSAS CITY, Jan. 29.—The proposed exodus of of the negroes from the United States to the Argentine Republic and other South American States has caused much comment among the colored race in this region, William J. Smith, a wealthy colored man of Topeka, who has just returned from the Argentine Republic, said to-day:

"I am perfeetly satisfied with the outlook for our race in the regions just seen by myself and my companions. The Government of the Argentine Republic has made us the most flattering propositions in regard to franchises and assistance in the way of lands and immunity from taxation for a long period of years. All the arragements have now been made and all the plans are perfected for the movement. I expect that when spring opens at least 300,000 people of my race will have all their arrangements made to start.

The Bard was asked to compose a little poem upon his childhood, and this is what he produced: "How dear to my heart is the school I attended, and how I remember so distant and dim, that red headed Bill and the pin that I bended, and carefully put on the bench under him. And how I recall the surprise of the master, when Bill gave a yell and sprang up from the pin, so high that his bullet-head smashed up the plaster above, and the scholars all set up a din. The active boy Billy, that high-leaping Billy, that loud-shouting Billy who sat on a pin."

They keep a full line of the celebrated Milwaukee Oil Grain Shoes, for men, women and children; also the Crusader Boots and Shoes.

West Virginia Boundary.

Governor E. W. Wilson, of West Virginir, has written to Governor Jackson, of Maryland, as follows:

"At the last session of our Legislature an act was passed 'to confirm and establish a part of the boundary line between the State of West Virginia and the State of Maryland.' The act is on page 237 of the acts of 1887, a copy of which I transmit to your Excellency by mail. Anticipating your concurrence, I heartily join in the wish that the question may be finally settled at the present session of the Legislature of Maryland." The act referred is as follows: "Section 1. That the boundary line as run and marked by N. Michler, United States engineer, in the year 1859, under the direction of A. W. McDonald, commissioner on the part of Virginia, and Thomas J. Lee, commissioner on part Maryland, from the Fairfax stone to the Pennsylvania line, between the county of Preston, W. Va., and the county of Allegany, (now Garrett,) Md., be and the same is hereby approved and confirmed as the true boundary line between the State of West Virginia and the State of Maryland." "Section 2. But this act shall not take effect until and unless the State of Maryland shall pass an act or acts confirming and rendering valid all entries, grants, patents and titles from the commonwealth of Virginia to any person or persons, to lands situated and lying between the new Maryland line hereby established and the old Maryland line heretofore claimed by Virginia and West Virginia, to the same extent and like legal effect as though said old Maryland line were hereby confirmed and established."

The West Virginia law, it is said, will meet with vigorous opposition from the Maryland Legislature, the proposed basis of settlement being it is claimed, largely in favor of the West Virginia side, — Baltimore Sun's Annapolis Correspondent.

Grantsville.

JAN. 26.—After a long, and, perhaps, welcome silence, I send you a few items from this place.

A merry sleighing party from Salisbury, Pa., consisting of eight young men with an equal number of young ladies, visited our town last Friday night. After taking supper at the National House and enjoying themselves immensely, they returned home, promising to return again in the near future.

The property of W. H. Chapman, formerly of this place, was sold last Saturday at public auction to Wm. C. Broadwater for $1608. It consisted of dwelling house, store room and blacksmith shop.

Rev. O. Z. Hardman, of Salisbury, Pa., has taken charge of the Lutheran congregation at this place, the congregation becoming a part of the Salisbury charge.

Mr. George Schlossnagle, of Accident, is busy circulating a petition for the repeal of the local option law.

Mr. Abraham J. Beachy died Saturday night last, of pneumonia, after an illness of only four days. He was in his sixty-sixth year.

Dr. E. H. Bartlettt visited our school this week.

Dr. Getty, Henry Smouse, Frank Spicer, Henry Winterberg and Frank McKinzie made a trip across the county to Oakland Monday last.

Wm. H. Chapman, of Confluence, Pa., visited a few of his old friends here a few days ago.

Jones E. Gnagey and S. R. Frantz made a flying trip to Cumberland last week.

Mr. George Sibert has been appointed Constable for this district. B.

Irrepressible Democratic Conflicts.

The Republican is very blind or dull who cannot see that his party is about to enter on a new career, by virtue of its inherent strength from the magnificent results of its now dominant principle and policy of Protection and by reason of the ignorant rashness of Mr. Cleveland in making his re-election depend on the triumph of free trade. The Democratic cities of the North have become hives of manufacturing industry, and armies of Democratic laborers are only waiting efficient leadership to come out for the party that protects them against foreign pauper labor. The Democracy of the South is fast dividing on Mr. Cleveland's new issue and inteligent and enterprising Southern men are seeing the facts and the irresistible logic of such Southern Democratic advocates of the Republican system of Protection as the Atlanta Constitution, which, last Thursday, stated the changed Southern situation in the fewest and truest words, when it said that "under the system of slavery, it was natural that the South should be in favor of free trade; but all the conditions have changed. The big plantations have been for the most part cut up into small farms, and the great need of the small farmer, as well as the large farmer, is a home market where the diversified products of the farm may be sold for cash as readily as the cotton crop."

So our able Democratic contemporary, the Albany Times, warns the supporters of Mr. Cleveland, that "he has unquestionably done a great deal by his message on the tariff to split up into antagonistic factions those business men's and workingmen's clubs which canvassed and paraded for him, independent of a tariff issue, three and a half years ago."

These are specimen utterances of Democratic discontent with the ugly situation in which Mr. Cleveland's free trade message has landed his party. They plainly disclose the actual condition of a party hopelessly divided on the one issue that it had been shrewdly dodging since the war. No diplomacy can close the widening breach in the party. The "New South" sees that it needs Protection a hundred times more than New England does. All intelligent Southern sentiment—except that controlled by the "Whiskey Ring"—is in deadly hostility to internal taxes, and if those taxes are repealed the whole foundation of Mr. Cleveland's vague, clumsy and wild campaign against protection will be removed and he will find himself "in the air"—a novel and awkward situation for so vast a mass of stolidity.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

A Wonderful Bridge.

The New York Sun of a recent date says: Of all the plans to throw an iron highway across the Hudson River that is the most stupendous which has ever been suggested by the men who have selected for their points of anchorage Hoooken and a spot on the New York side between Fourteenth and Twenty-eighth streets. It is greatest in engineering features because it involves the solution of problems which no engineer has attempted to solve, and it is greatest in financial aspects because the total cost is placed at between $37,000,000 and $50,000,000. How vast this is one may appreciate upon by reflecting that the great Brooklyn bridge cost only $15,000,000 including the purchrse of property. The Brooklyn bridge towers are 276 feet high above water. The Hoboken bridge towers will go down beneath the water 75 and 180 feet, and the rise above the river's level 500 feet, making them not only higher by far than the uppermost points of the East River structure, but even higher than the loftiest structure or monument now standing anywhere in the world. The Brooklyn bridge from anchorage to anchorage is 3,454 feet long; the Hoboken bridge between the same points would be 5,350 feet. The strands used on the Brooklyn bridge are 16 inches in diameter; those of the proposed structure would be 48 inches. The Brooklyn bridge carries only two railroad tracks besides the pedestrian and horse ways; the contemplated marvel is designed for six roilroad tracks at first, with room for four more upon the demand, besides wagon and pedestrian ways. Should the plan ever be carried into effect the bridge would be the bridge of the world, for it would be longer, higher and larger for traffic than any other bridge now existing or proposed,

This scheme was first formarly presented to the public at a meeting of the American Society of Civil Engineers some three weeks ago by Gustav Lindenthal, an engineer who has studied the North River bridge problem for a long time, and has made surveys surroundings, and complete examinations. The Engineering News, commenting upon the paper which Mr. Lindenthal read before the society, thus refers to the thought of impossibility which is apt to arise in the mind of almost any layman:

The graudeur of the project is almost appalling, creating at first sight a natural feeling that the chance for its construction must be small. But this is an age of great enterprise and of superabundant capital for anything which it can be shown will pay, either directly or indirectly. We think there is abundant reason to belive that such a bridge as that proposed would pay even now, while the engineering difficulties are certainly less formidable for the resources of to-day than were those which confronfronted the St. Louis, East River, and many other bridges when their construction was begun.

As to the probability of this bridge being a safe investment for superabundant capital the figures presented by Mr. Lindenthal afford an emphatic affirmative answer. His estimates are that the bridge itself will cost $15,000,000, and the property which must be purchased $22,000,000. On this total cost the interest at 5 per cent would be $1,850,000. There are ten existing railroads to use the bridge for both local and through traffic. For the first year the whole passenger movement is estimated at 22,000,000, or an average of 60,000 a day. The toll proposed is ten cents for each person on an average, the greater charge being for through and the less for suburban travel. This would afford an income of $2,100,000. From mail, express, freight, pedestrian and wagon charges an addition of 20 per cent is counted, which it is considered will be sufficient for maintenance, expenses and interest charges.

The length of the middle span is 2,850 feet from the centre of each tower. This alone is a great attempt to surpass what so far has been attempted, for the largest single span ever planned up to this day is that over the Fourth in Scotland, which is 1,500 feet. The length of the end spans is 1,500 feet each, making a total length, including the anchorages, of 6,500 feet. From the underside of the passageways the distance in the clear to the surface of the middle of the river will be 145 feet at 50 degrees Fahrenheit. The rise and fall of the floor will be four feet; in other words the height will be eight feet more in January than in August. The elevation of the towers will be 400 feet to the lower cable, and the total height above the water will be 500 feet. The depth of their foundation on the Jersey side will be 75 feet, and on the New York side 180 feet. The masonry piers on which these towers are to stand will be 340 feet long, 180 feet wide, and will rise 25 feet above high water. The towers are of wrought iron and steel, with sixteen columns in each, or eight under each arch support. The columns are octagonal in shape, and taper from seven feet in diameter at the botton to five feet at the top. The shape of the towers is chosen for the sake of architectural impressions, and largely as the best form to withstand tornadoes striking the bridge. The flat-appearing stone anchorages at each end are each 210 feet high above the pavement—considerably more than Trinity's steeple—each 320 feet long and 180 feet wide at the base. Each is tunneled to accommodate six railroad tracks. The superstructure consists of two inverted braced arches of steel wire cables, supported on the metallic towers, from which they descend to the anchorages. The cables are fifty feet apart, and each is four feet in diameter. The wires forming the cable are wrapped in a steel envelope to protect them from rain and snow and the weather generally. Between this envelope and the stand of wires is left an air spase of two inches to protect the interior metal from heating by the sun. The platform is 86 feet wide—the same as the Brooklyn bridge, and is designed for trains carrying a load of 12,000 tons in a length of 1,500 feet. The ordinary traffic will strain the bridge only 10 per cent of its load-bearing capacity.

A Deep Game.

A bogus detective made his appearance in Grafton last week and played a sharp dodge on several saloon keepers. Representing to the authorities, it is said, that he had been employed by the W. C. T. U. at that place to break up the liquor traffic, he received official information and went to work on the scheme. He called at one saloon and got a drink, after which, instead of reporting to the mayor, he simply showed his authority and said that unless the bartender planked down ten dollars as hush money he would give him away. The liquor man weakened, gave him the money, and he then visited another saloon with the same result. At the third place he failed, and to avoid arrest, left the town. It turns out that the stranger was not a detective at all, nor had he been employed by the W. C. T. U. or any one else.

The opponents of the Blair educational bill hope that the House committee on Education will be found antagonistic to the bill, and so hold it back in committee after its passage by the Senate, if it seems probable that the House will pass it. That the bill will pass the Senate by a considerable majority no one questions. The chief point unsettled by the friends of the bill in the Senate is whether it is expedient to debate it at length. The Republicans intend to send it to the House at an early day, and to permit the House to assume the responsibility for defeating it. The friends of the bill in both houses claim to have assurance that this measure is as strong in the House this year as it was last, and that it will pass if it can be brought to a vote.

The Boston Traveller very pertinently reminds the voters of the country that every prophecy made by the Republican party, through its leaders in 1884, in case a Democratic administration was elected, has been fulfilled. They predicted that the tariff duties would not be reduced, and that is true. They said there would be no retrenchment. They were correct in that. They said Democrats would not wipe out the surplus. They have not. They said before the end of Cleveland's term, if elected, the principal offices of the country would be in Democratic hands, and a complete sweep except where law prevented would show the doctrine of "spoils" re-established on the Jacksonian system. This is the record at this moment, and a worse one, so far as the civil service reform is concerned, could not be imagined.

FIRELIGHT.

Not summer's noontide glory
Infolding mountain hoary,
A breadth of woven gold,
For moonbeams as they quiver
At midnight on the river;
Nor starlight pure and cold;

Nor glare of lamps revealing
The giddy mazes wheeling,
Of feet that never tire—
Can rival in their splendor
That mystic charm and tender,
A trembling, fitful fire.

For while the gay light dances
Upon the wall, what fancies
Come dancing over the soul—
Come quicker yet and quicker,
The more the bright tongues flicker
In lightnings from the coal.

Then palaces are builded,
And days unborn are gilded
With visionary gleam;
'Tis then the memory passes
Beneath the churchyard grasses
In retrospective dream.

Ah, Firelight, weird, enchanting,
Bright hopes and dreams implanting,
Most sweet of lights and blest,
Beneath thy benediction,
Hearts weary with life's friction
Can find a moment's rest.

GIGANTIC BEARS.

The Grizzly and the Silver Tip, [illegible] which Mr. Browning is chairman, came home Saturday night and left for Annapolis Monday morning.

In the Senate Tuesday a Committee on Temperance was announced, with Mr. Browning as chairman.

Petitions were largely signed in Oakland this week protesting against the bills reducing the fees of State's Attorney and Sheriff. These petitions were signed by about all the prominent men of both political parties in Oakland. They are generally of the opinion that if [illegible] so?

[illegible] is a fool to go in arter bear alone." The bruins of the East and the bruins of the West are almost totally different animals. The "Ursa Majors" of this latitude are monstrous in size, endowed with ugly dispositions and prodigious strength, and as for grit, they dispute—and very often successfully, too—the sovereignty of the mountains and forests with the king of American beasts, the mountain lion. Hunters disagree upon the point of how many different species of the bear tribe we have in the Northwest. There are at least three distinct types of the family in Montana, namely, the grizzly, brown and black bear. Beside these, there are also gray bears, cinnamon bears, and the Rocky Mountain grayback. The true gray is seldom, if ever, seen now as high as the forty-fifth parallel, and as far east as the main divide; the cinnamon is simply a cross between the brown and black bears, and the mighty silver tip is neither more or less than a mongrel of the brown and grizzly, partaking strongly of the nature of the two, particularly of the latter. In fact, I think I am justified in asserting that all the members of the species intermarry, and that the silver tip is the king of the family. This big fellow, springing from the grizzly and the brown, combines all the ferocity and tough strength of the former with the agility and stubbornness of the latter, each distinctive trait being more prominent in him, and possessed to a greater degree than by the very animals from which he borrows them. The silver tip is unquestionably the ruler of the family, by reason of his great size and belligerent disposition. Lewis and Clarke, in their narrative of their journey through this region nearly one hundred years ago, speak of meeting not only brown and [illegible] so? Not by any means. It is true it is not pressed or in default, but there are obligations of many millions; legal, equitable and honorable, which ought to be met at once. Most prominent among them are the pension arrearages due the old soldiers of the late war, their widows, minor children and dependent parents.

At the beginning of the war, to induce and stimulate enlistments, Congress passed laws offering bounties to [illegible] of fur badly needed a bath. In one place, after coming upon a so-called white bear, the journal describes him as possessing small black eyes (almost like jet beads), a hide of bright yellowish brown, the front of the fore-legs near the feet being quite black, and the animal itself of a ferocious and warlike nature. This description of the white bear of 1804–5 tallies with the cinnamon bear of 1887, which makes him about the same ugly customer that he was a hundred years ago. There are few black bears in this immediate vicinity, most of them inhabiting the western slope of the Rocky Mountains and the forests that thence continue to the Pacific Ocean.

The woods of Oregon and Washington are overrun with black bears. The largest black fellow I ever saw in my life was in the woods of Washington Territory, near Mount Rainier. The black bears of Montana, as well as the cinnamon, as a rule inhabit low places, such as creek and river bottoms, willow marshes, and timbered spots, but grizzlies and silver tips stick to high altitudes, from which even hunger pressure seldom drives them. Grizzlies are generally credited with highly-cultivated appetites for carnivorous food. Camp-fire stories excitedly tell of the bloodthirsty diet these monsters habitually thrive upon, but were all the blood-curdling yarns aired around the cheerful blaze carefully sifted down for facts I am afraid that fully ninety per cent. of the grizzly stories would turn out to be fiction. I do not think a grizzly is carnivorous from choice. He seldom descends from his mountain home to the creeks and rivers in search of wild plums and chokeberries (the favorite diet of brown, cinnamon, and black bears), but prefers to remain aloft and feast upon the stores laid up for winter use by his industrious neighbors, the gophers and mountain squirrels. Pine nuts are plentiful high up, and then the grubs and worms found beneath old stones and moss-overgrown boulders are good enough for King Bruin while they last. When the nut, berry and plum supply runs short, none of the family hesitate to fall back upon a diet of pork, beef, mutton or venison. A recent report from the Highwoods, in the neighborhood of Arrow and Wolf creeks, says that more bears have been seen this year than for ten years past, and that quite a number of cattle have been killed by them of late. A few months ago, at Mullery's ranch, near Gorham, a big silver tip came down out of the mountains one night, invaded the hog pasture of that industrious ranchman, and in a very short time laid out no less than thirty fine porkers. The hogs squealed, made a great fuss, of course, and as long as there was a show of resistance the bear never stopped boxing their ears. One blow of his mighty paw was enough to kill a hog, and there is no telling where he would have stopped had he not been interrupted in this pleasant pastime.

The grayback of the Rockies is rather a different brute from his cousin of the Adirondacks and the Pennsylvania hills. Perhaps the Eastern members of this interesting family never weigh more than four hundred or five hundred pounds, but out this way many of the grizzlies and silver tips caught have touched the beam at one thousand and twelve hundred pounds and even greater. Mr. Charles Soper, of Bozeman, a thriving city a short distance west of here, is said to have shot one of the largest graybacks ever seen in the West. The hide was something tremendous. The beast having been killed late in the fall, at a time when he was plentifully supplied with "bear's grease," it would not be wide of the mark to estimate his weight when alive at sixteen hundred pounds. Certainly the enormous hide justified these figures, and the claws and head preserved would justly entitle him to the credit of being the father of the family.

As a proof of the wisdom of the old hunter's warning about "going in arter bear alone," the following narrative will best illustrate its truthfulness:

"A party of gold hunters started out from Deadwood some years ago to prospect the country to the north and west of that mining camp. The men in the party were 'old timers,' with one or two exceptions, and among the latter was a Swede, full of grit, who stood nearly seven feet in his stockings. The Swede, however, whose family name was Franck, was by no means a 'tenderfoot,' having dwelt some time in the Leadville mining camps and boasted that he had killed 'bar in his day,' and was afraid of 'no four-footed critter that roamed the mountains.' The party of twelve were climbing a steep mountain, darkness was coming on, and prospects of a supperless night were in view, when the seven-foot Scandinavian volunteered to push on ahead in the hopes of securing an elk, deer, or mountain sheep. The foreigner was a good shot with his rifle, had plenty of grit and courage, and his immense strength and powerful physique rendered it extremely improbable that he would find his match in the timber ahead. The hunter disappeared, and the others toiled on behind, climbing the steep ascent wearily and footsore. At one place the road wound around a steep precipice, the sheer descent of the cut basaltic walls on the left being something like a thousand feet. Far below the tops of giant pines could be discerned, but in the awful depth they appeared like stunted shrubs and bushes. Near the summit and to the right the free land broadened or widened out, and this was covered with a dense growth of willows and stunted pines, from which proceeded the most awful grumblings and howls imaginable. Just as the party appeared on the top all at once out from the stubble came retreating the big Swede, followed by an enormous silver tip, who was driving him slowly backward toward the edge of the precipice. The man was bleeding badly, nearly all of one side of his face being torn away, the result of a wicked blow from the huge paw of the vicious monster. The bear, on the other hand, was quite as badly wounded as his antagonist. His head was a mass of gore, the lower jaw was simply hanging by a few shreds, and one of his hind legs was broken. The Swede was backing slowly, holding in his right hand a large hunting knife, which every second he would plunge to the hilt in the shoulder of his shaggy foe. At one thrust of the Swede the bear caught him fairly with a return whack of his monstrous paw that must have broken the man's arm, for he quickly transferred the blade to his left hand, and gave back blow for blow as best he could. The denouement came so suddenly that the horror-stricken comrades could render no possible assistance. Even had they started on a run, they could not have reached their friend in time, and to risk a shot with a rifle would have been just as dangerous to the Swede as to the bear. Step by step the man was forced back, until he hung almost upon the edge of the precipice. There seemed no hope for him unless he could assume the aggressive in turn, and this could not be done, as the man was doing his utmost, and still the silver tip was getting the better of the fight. All at once the desperate animal raised his huge paw and brought it down with a terrific force upon the head of the man. The scalp was torn away by this last stroke and the poor fellow was blinded by his own blood. Again the bear struck him, and the Swede tottered on the brink with nothing in reach to lay his hands on by which he might save himself. Evidently with the desperation of death staring him in the face Franck did the only thing possible under the circumstances. As he was swaying backward and ready to go over he threw from him the useless knife, and, in despair of all hope, madly clutched the beast around the neck with both arms. The force of the last onslaught carried the animal too far, for the next moment both the silver tip and the man, in that awful embrace of death, went rolling over the frightful precipice together and were dashed into an unrecognizable mass on the rocks and pines hundreds of feet below. Franck's rifle was found in a bunch of quaking aspens, broken short off at the stock. There were no cartridges in the chamber, which proved that the seven-footer had certainly exhausted his magazine before drawing his knife, and that after he had shot all his shells the silver tip had insisted upon fighting at close quarters, which accounts for the broken stock and verifies the probability of the man clubbing his gun when the maddened beast rushed upon him. It was late in the fall when the encounter occurred, probably at a time when the monster was heavily equipped with fat, and, of course, the long keen knife would have to pass through a thick layer of "blubber" before encountering a vital part.—Fort Keogh (M. T.) Cor. N. Y. Times.

THRILLING ADVENTURE.

A Famous Sportsman's Narrow Escape from an Enraged Panther.

How it feels to find one's self in the jaws of a panther is that kind of knowledge which most people are well content to acquire at second-hand. Probably all men would not have the same sensations, but this is the account which Colonel Barrs gives of such an experience. He was a born sportsman, and, of course, could enjoy many things which to ordinary persons would seem any thing but pleasant:

The panther came for me with lightning bounds. I could see nothing, owing to its tremendous speed, but a shadowy-looking form with two large, bright, round eyes fixed upon me with an unmeaning stare, as it literally flew towards me. Such was the vision of a moment! My presence of mind did not desert me. I raised my gun and fired with all the care I could at such short notice. But I missed, and the panther landed, light as a feather, with its arms round my shoulders. Thus we stood for a few seconds, and I distinctly felt the animal sniffing for my throat. Mechanically I turned my head so as to keep the thick, wadded curtain of my helmet-cover in front of the creature's muzzle; but still I could hear and feel plainly the rapid yet cautious efforts it was making to find an opening, so as to tear open the jugular vein.

I was helpless, and so stood perfectly still, well knowing that Sandford would liberate me, if possible. At the first onslaught we were so placed that he could have hit the panther only by firing through me, which would have been injudicious, at least. As may easily be supposed, the animal did not spend much time in investigating the nature of a wadded hat-cover, and, before my friend could take aim without jeopardizing my own life, the beast pounced on my left elbow, taking a piece out, and buried its long, sharp fangs in the joint till they met. At the same time I was hurled to the earth with such force that I knew not how I got there nor what became of my gun. Still, throughout, I maintained a clear impression of what was going on.

I knew that I was lying on the ground with the panther on top of me, and I could feel my elbow-joint wabbling in and out as the brute ground its jaws, with a movement imperceptible to the bystanders, but which felt to me as though I was being violently shaken all over. Now I listened anxiously for the report of Sandford's shot, which I knew would be heard immediately, and carefully refrained from making the slightest sound or movement, lest his aim should be disturbed thereby. In a few seconds the loud and welcome detonation, which from its proximity almost deafened me, struck upon my ear.

I sat up. I was free! the panther gone! I looked round and found that I was some distance from the place where I had fallen, so that the beast must have dragged me some little way. Sandford, as soon as he had got the chance, had placed the muzzle of his rifle to the side of my antagonist and fired a large bullet right through it, which had caused it to dart back hastily to its lair.—Youth's Companion.

MARRIED BY ACCIDENT.

Men and Women Who Found Life Partners Under Strange Circumstances.

Marriages are often the result of accident. It seems strange, but the most prudent persons will sometimes conceive an irresistible attachment at the suggestion of a word or look. When once under the spell of the verb "to love" they go through all the forms and finish the conjugation of the verb before the altar. The few may give this subject the consideration it deserves, but the many, there is reason to fear, are guided by impulse. A skipper of a coasting vessel called at the village inn and asked the landlady, a young widow: "Do you know where I can get a mate? I have lost my mate."

"I am very sorry for you, Mr. ——," she said, smiling. "I want a mate, too, and can not get one. I'll tell you what I'll do; if you'll be mine I'll be yours." He closed with the bargain, and the widow keeping her word, he is now supplied with two mates.

A young man at a church bazar was buttonholed by a lady; she would not let him go until he bought something. He looked at her stall, which contained fancy work of various kinds.

"Why," he said, "I see nothing here that would be of the least use to me, a bachelor, except yourself. The rest would be dear to me at any price."

"I will be cheap enough," she said, coaxingly.

"If you could be dear enough, perhaps——"

"O, come! You are just the person I want," taking him by the arm.

She sold him one article after another, keeping up an agreeable conversation the while, and before all was done he had purchased every thing on the stall. Then, at settling up, there was something said about discount.

"I can not return any money," she said, blushing, "but if you think me dear enough, there's mamma. She can give you my hand." The bargain was accordingly concluded.

An eminent doctor, who had saved the life of a lady, a personal friend, was asked his charge. He said he generally allowed his patient friends to remunerate him as they thought befitting.

"But don't you often get disappointed on these terms," she inquired.

"I may say, never."

"As you are so easily pleased—here," and she playfully gave him her empty hand, while in the other was concealed a check for a handsome sum. "How easily I could have taken you in!" she she added, producing the check.

"But you have only succeeded in drawing me out," he said, declining to relinquish her hand. "Don't insult me with a check; I am most generously rewarded."

Perhaps she understood the doctor's difficulty and wished to help him out of it. At any rate, the giving of her hand led him to offer his heart.

This was how a gentleman got his wife when, in a tobacconist's shop, he asked a girl behind the counter, who happened to have red hair, if she would oblige him with a match.

"With pleasure, if you will have a red-headed one," she promptly replied, with such a suggestive, demure smile, that eventually the red-headed match was handed over.

A lady with a fine figure having taken a fancy to a valuable ring, which she saw ticketed in a shop window, went inside to examine it. "It is exceedingly lovely; I wish it were mine," she said on satisfying herself. "What smaller figure will tempt you?"

"No other figure than the figure before me," he said, giving her an admiring look at the same time. "It is exceedingly lovely. I wish—I could tempt you with the ring."

"I think I'll take it," she said, laying down the money amid blushes. Of course he accepted the money, but, getting her address, he made such good use of the hint that the next ring which she got was given by him in church.

Quite as singular was the beginning of the courtship of the man who went into a shop for a pair of shoes.

"I want them wide, please," he said to the girl in attendance, "as I have a good broad understanding."

She laughed at this reference to the breadth of his feet, and said:

"A very good thing, too, in a man, but not in woman."

"How do you make out that what is good in one sex is bad in the other?"

"Ah, it is quite simple. You see nature intended man to be supported by a firm soul, but woman by a yielding husband."

Whether he made a yielding husband or not, report at any rate says that he made her his wife.—London Rare Bits.

Soldiering in Burmah.

Shortly after my enlistment our regiment was ordered to Burmah to subdue the natives. In addition to the English troops we had natives as well. The hostile natives were known as dacoits, and we had some very lively skirmishes with them. A friendly Buddhist priest informed us one night of the location of an enemy's camp, and a detachment was sent out to capture it. We surrounded them and they tried to fight their way out, and one big fellow came within three inches of splitting my head with his knife. We captured about thirty of them. Another time we attacked a little army of them who had taken up a position at the summit of a steep hill. They rolled big bowlders down upon us, and I barely escaped one that must have weighed about ten tons.—Philadelphia Record.

TEMPERANCE READING.

A Barrel of Whisky.

A drayman rolled forth from his cart to the street
A red-headed barrel, well bound and complete;
And on it red letters, like forked tongues of flame,
Emblazoned the grade, number, quality, fame,
Of this world-renowned whisky from somebody's still,
Who arrested the grain on its way to the mill.

So there stood the barrel delivered, but I
Could see that a shadow was hovering nigh;
A sulphurous shadow that grew, as I gazed,
To the form of Mephisto. Though sorely amazed,
I ventured to question this imp of the realm,
Where Vice is the Pilot, with Crime at the helm:
And asked him politely his mission to name,
And if he was licensed to retail the same
Identical barrel of whisky which he
Was fondly surveying with devilish glee?

"O, I never handle the stuff," he replied,
"My partners mortal are trusty and tried;
Mayhap, peradventure you might wish to look
At the invoice complete—I will read from this book.
You will find that this barrel contains something more
Than forty-two gallons of whisky galore,"
And ere I could slip but another word in,
He checked it off gaily, this cargo of sin:

"A barrel of headaches, of heartaches, of woes;
A barrel of curses, a barrel of blows;
A barrel of tears from a world-weary wife;
A barrel of sorrow, a barrel of strife;
A barrel of all-unavailing regret;
A barrel of cares and a barrel of debt;
A barrel of crime and a barrel of pain;
A barrel of hopes ever blasted and vain;
A barrel of falsehood, a barrel of cries
That fall from the maniac's lips as he dies;
A barrel of agony, heavy and dull;
A barrel of poison—of this nearly full;
A barrel of liquid damnation that fires
The brain of the fool who believes it inspires;
A barrel of poverty, ruin and blight;
A barrel of terrors that grow with the night;
A barrel of hunger, a barrel of groans;
A barrel of orphans' most pitiful moans;
A barrel of serpents that hiss as they pass
From the head on the liquor that glows in the glass.
My barrel! My treasure! I bid thee farewell,
Sow ye the foul seed, I will reap it in Hell!"

ECONOMIC DAMAGES.

The Burden Entailed Upon the Public by the Liquor Traffic—Pestilence, Famine and Moral Desolation.

A recent number of the Chautauquan presents a discussion of the economic effects of the saloon, by means of letters written for that magazine by prominent men. These are a few sentences from the letters:

"The paralysis of industry, the increase of pauperism and crime, directly due to the liquor traffic, are the heaviest economic burdens our modern society bears, greatly outweighing all the burdens caused by war or famine or pestilence."—Dr. J. H. Seelye, President of Amherst College.

"The liquor interest is to-day antagonistic to all the economic interests of society; it disturbs the entire business and political systems; it impedes and interrupts production and destroys the completed product. In short, from every point of view economically, the liquor traffic is a public nuisance and danger."—Hamilton W. Mabie, Associate Editor of Christian Union.

"The indirect economic damages of the liquor traffic in the manufacture of paupers, criminals and madmen are ghastly in their enormous and permanent total. Mr. Gladstone was not extravagant when he said in full Parliament that the ravages of intemperance, because continuous, have been a greater curse to the Anglo-Saxon races than war, pestilence and famine."—Joseph Cook.

"My disbelief in prohibition probably renders me a more disinterested observer of its results, and I do not hesitate to say that though attended with some deplorable tendencies, it has been of great advantage to the State, both morally and from the material and economic stand-point. Very few of its citizens would willingly return to the dominion of the dram-shop with its attendant crime, disorder and social misery. Whether the people would prefer prohibition to high license, I am not sure; but between prohibition and free whisky, they would be practically unanimous for prohibition."—Senator J. J. Ingalls, President of the United States Senate.

"The man who buys that which sustains his body has his strength and force to exchange for the creation of new wealth. The man who buys clothing, though it wears out, has refined himself and kept himself in condition to buy new clothing. But can this be said anywhere of the liquor traffic? Does the man who exchanges his five cents for a drink better his condition to add another five cents to his wealth?

"It seems to me that this principle, which can be readily demonstrated, carried out to its final results, must show that the saloon-keeper stands in the same relation as the lottery keeper, the gambler, and all classes of fraud, and, therefore, must be as fundamentally condemned as are these great evils of the land."—Lewis Miller, President of Chautauqua.

"Who dares to think of dollars in connection with the saloon? Think rather of pestilence and famine, of moral desolation and every evil thing. He who lives on the income of the saloon is a pauper. He lives at the expense of others, and gives in return nothing that can help or bless. His trade is a blight. His prosperity entails want and grief. Count the cost of the saloon if you can, but count it not in dollars."—Bishop S. M. Merrill.

"One who buys flour is richer for it, as well as he who sells it. Liquor may enrich the seller, but it impoverishes the buyer. All experience shows that the community is richer by driving out of their business those who are enriched by public pauperism, and by forcing them into employments where they shall enrich the consumer as well as themselves."—William Hayes Ward, Editor of Independent.

WHY IT IS.

Questions Answered—If Men Have No Self-Respect Why Should They Expect Others to Take a Personal Interest in Them.

Many who drink often ask the questions: "How is it that I am not trusted?" "Why is a day's pay taken from my wages when I am sick and the other men who work alongside of me are allowed to draw pay even if they are absent?"

If these men were to clear their minds and open their eyes "and see themselves as others see them," they would never think of asking such questions.

For example, let us take a case which happened only a few days ago. A man was found by the police in Detroit, Mich., in one of the lowest parts of the city, asleep in an alleyway and under the influence of liquor. When searched in the police station the police found in his pockets $8,000 in bills, $12,000 in checks and drafts and $7,000 worth of precious stones—making in all $27,000—belonging to a firm in which this man was employed. If this firm should happen to retain him he will be one of the first to ask: Why don't they trust me as they did a little while ago? Did I ever lose any thing belonging to them? Even if I do take a little now and then I know how to take care of myself. Of course, he is liable to reform, but his employers are not going to take any more risks.

In the second place the men who complain of being "docked" when they "absent" themselves from work are very numerous. Many of such have come in contact with the writer. Only a day or two ago a man who is "under the weather" every day of his life said: "I can not understand why my employer watches me so carefully, and if I am not up to the mark at all times I am knocked about and yelled at." When answered: "You drink, and that is the only reason." To this he replied: "I do my work honestly, and what I drink is my own." Of course, he can drink and swallow as much as his stomach will hold, but when reminded of the fact that he was a blood relative of his employer, and a man who seldom drew a sober breath, and whose clothes were the dirtiest of any man in the establishment, and only such as his kind were the growlers and the ones who caused loss of time and money to themselves and every establishment in which they were employed, then he began to think.

If such men have no respect for themselves, why should they expect others to take an interest in them?

In nine cases out of ten if asked to join a Temperance society they are insulted and will not hesitate in telling one that they can mind their own business.—Irish World.

SAVING THEIR MOTHER.

Pathetic Scene in a Chicago Police Court —A Fine Remitted.

A pathetic scene is described in Winslow's Monthly. A wretched creature, a woman whose appetite conquered all other motives of action, was brought before a Chicago magistrate for drunkenness. Clinging to her tattered gown were two children, a boy and girl, the former only seven years of age, but made prematurely old by the hardships of his wretched life.

"Five dollars and costs," said the Judge, sternly. "Seven dollars and sixty cents in all."

Instantly the little fellow started up, and, taking his sister's arm, he cried out: "Come on! We's got to git that money, or mam'll hev to go to jail. Jest wait, Mr. Jedge, and we'll git it!"

The children hurried out of the court-room, and, going from store to to store, solicited contributions to "keep mam from going to jail," the boy bravely promising every giver to return the money as soon as he could earn it. Soon he came running back into the court-room, and, laying a handful of small change on the magistrate's desk, exclaimed:

"There's two dollars, Mr. Jedge, and I can't git no more now. I aint as big as mam, and I can't do as much work; but if you'll jist let me go to jail 'stead o' her, I'll stay longer to make up for it."

The bystanders wiped their eyes, and a policeman exclaimed: "Your mother shant' go to jail, my lad, if I have to pay the fine myself."

"I will remit the fine," said the Judge, and the woman, clasping her boy in her arms, sank upon her knees and solemnly vowed that she would lead a better life, and try to be worthy of such a son as that.

It has come to be that four drinks of whisky is almost equivalent to one murder. Two men had an altercation in a drinking and gambling saloon of Chicago the other day. One of them, swearing dire vengeance, went up to the bar and called for a glass of whisky. It was given him. He called for another; that also was passed over the counter by the vender of the vile stuff. Another and still another were called for and given. Then the man was insane enough to do any thing. A moment later he had put a bullet through a man's heart, and the wrong man at that. If the law lets the keeper of that den or the dealer-out of that poison go free, there is either something wrong with the law or with its executors.—Chicago Standard.

On January 1 a law went into effect in New Hampshire, by which twenty voters can assert any place where liquors are kept for sale to be a nuisance, and which carries the case before the Supreme Court. The defense has to prove the place is not a nuisance.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Mr. Holcomb, lately Secretary of the American Legation at Pekin, says that out of the 400,000,000 inhabitants of the Chinese Empire fully 300,000,000 spend less than one dollar and fifty cents a month for food.

—A contest over a seat in the Maryland Legislature is going on between two men who bear the striking names respectively of Scaggs and Sasscer. Scaggs is said to be a man of commanding ability. He recently remarked, with a pungency worthy of his high reputation for intellectual brilliancy: "I won't stand any of your Sasscer."

—A peculating student at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., was electrified the other day when he went to obtain a $10 note, part of which was protruding from the pocket of a vest hanging in an unoccupied room. A professor had connected the vest by an electric wire to a signal bell. The victim made a clean breast of his depredations.

—Bunko man (to stranger)—"Aren't you Mr. Smith, of Smithville?" Stranger—"No, sir. My name is Pressure of Philadelphia. I am forming a stock company to raise funds to develop the new and wonderful phenomenon which has been unfolded to my friend, Mr. Kesl——" But by this time the bunko man was blocks away.—N. Y. Sun.

—The old Connecticut pilgrim known as "the darned man" is dead. In young manhood his mind was unhinged by the sudden death of his affianced bride, and for the rest of his long life he tramped through the State, always wearing his wedding suit. The great desire of his life was to preserve that suit. And the only articles he ever solicited were needles and thread or yarn to mend it.

—A Pittsburgh coroner's jury recently returned the verdict "death from delirium tremens resulting from accidental causes." At another inquest, after hearing the doctor say that the subject, who killed himself with prussic acid, "only accelerated his death, which must have come from consumption in a very few weeks," the jury arrived at this unique verdict: "Death from consumption, accelerated by prussic acid."

—Foreign letters often come addressed in queer fashion. A newspaper was sent to Paris to announce the death of a gentleman at New York. The death notice gave the customary address for the funeral, adding, "Interment at Greenwood." To the bewilderment of the postman and the consternation of the family, letters of condolence were received addressed to "Mrs. Matilda Blank, So-and-so street. Interment at Greenwood." The melancholy addendum had been taken for a sort of suburban annex, such as Yonkers-on-Hudson.

—The president of one of the leading railroad corporations of the Northwest has made the following prediction: "It will not be long until points in Dakota within five hundred miles of Duluth will be sending wheat from their stations to Buffalo for fifteen cents a bushel." This means that when raised on Dakota's soil at a cost of from twenty-three to thirty cents a bushel, with an investment of $5.90 per acre, will bring in the local market, when freights to the seaboard are lowered to this extent, almost the same price that the Eastern farmer receives, raised at double the cost of production and on land representing eight times the capital invested.

—A Boston correspondent writes that the new rough-back playing cards, now becoming somewhat popular, were invented by a well-known club man, Mr. Endicott. He had been playing cards at a club, and after going home and to bed dreamed that he was playing poker and made a misdeal. One of his companions who had an excellent hand reproached him for making him lose the benefit of it. "Very well," Endicott said in his dream; "if you had had rough-back cards it wouldn't have happened. It isn't my fault." When he awoke in the morning he remembered his dream, and the idea of rough-backed cards seemed to him a good one. He reflected, experimented, perfected his improvement, patented it in three or four countries, and is now likely to make a fortune out of his dream.

CHANGED HIS OPINION.

A Man in Search of a House Apologizes to a Renting Agent.

A man who went out house-hunting became indignant when a real estate agent demanded a deposit of fifty cents for each key.

"What, do you suppose I want to steal the keys?"

"O, no."

"Then why do you want me to put up money for them?"

"It is our rule, sir."

"Yes, and one that reflects on the honesty of every man who has dealings with you. Here's a dollar. Give me keys to two of your houses which are palaces now, but which will be tumble-down barns when I look at them."

The gentleman returned late in the afternoon. "I don't like your houses," said he. "They are, as I expected, nothing but barns. Here are your keys; give me my dollar. By the way, I owe you an apology."

"What for?"

"You know I complained against leaving a deposit for the keys."

"Yes."

"Said that such a demand reflected upon my honesty."

"Yes."

"I wish to announce a change of opinion, and commend such shrewd business methods."

"Why so?"

"Well, I discovered, somewhat to my surprise, too, that if I hadn't left the dollar with you I would not have returned the keys."—Arkansaw Traveler.

GUNS AND CRUISERS.

An Alabama Congressman Chats About Fast European War Ships.

Congressman Herbert, who has been abroad since the close of the last session of Congress, devoted considerable attention to the study of naval matters. His service as Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee in the last Congress made him especially familiar with the subject, and, of course, added to his interest in his studies and researches.

"I saw the fastest cruiser ever built," he said to your correspondent, "She was just being completed by an English firm when I visited her. She is finished now, however, and has been tested and makes, as I learn from the builders, over twenty-one knots an hour."

"How many miles is that, Mr. Herbert?"

"A knot," said the ex-Chairman of the Naval Committee, with a look of pity for the ignorance of the newspaper man who don't know a knot from a mile, "a knot, my dear sir, is about a mile and one-seventh. Apply your mental arithmetic, and you will find that twenty-one knots are equivalent to twenty-four miles. As this vessel made something over twenty-one knots, it is safe to put down her speed at nearly twenty-five miles an hour, or nearly equal to a fair railroad rate."

"How does that compare with the speed attained by our new cruisers?"

"Well," was the frank reply, "it is considerably ahead of us. Our new cruisers as now completed we began several years ago, and have not all the appliances of the latest sort to secure speed. They make something over sixteen knots an hour. We are promised, however, that one or two of the vessels lately contracted for will be as fast as any thing afloat in this line."

"Does this new fast cruiser carry very large guns?"

"No; cruisers do not carry large guns, you know. She has four twenty-one ton guns and several smaller ones."

"You don't call twenty-one ton guns large, then?"

"O, no; they are very small compared with the large guns made now."

"How large are the largest guns now made?"

"That is a little difficult to answer at an off-hand statement, but it is within the limit to say that the great guns now made, the greatest of them, shoot a ball sixteen inches or more in diameter and weighing over 2,000 pounds."

"How far do they shoot?"

"Some of the great guns now made will shoot a ball fifteen miles."

"Fifteen miles—you don't mean that, do you, Mr. Herbert?"

"Yes, fifteen miles. Of course, they will not shoot with great precision that distance, nor will they shoot so far as that from the deck of a vessel. But they can shoot that far with sufficient accuracy, for instance, to throw a shot into a city or among a fleet of vessels. Of course, it would only be by chance that it would hit a single vessel if fired at it at that distance. In fact, it would be difficult, probably impossible, to see the hull of a vessel that distance."

"Why can not these big guns be fired as well from a vessel's deck as on land?"

"Because the deck of the vessel does not offer the same firm and unyielding foundation; and, beside, the use of so much powder and such a heavy gun would make it likely to sink the vessel from whose deck it was fired. You see when they shoot these long distances they elevate the gun—that is to say, they elevate the muzzle of it, so that the gun stands at an angle of thirty or even forty-five degrees to the earth's surface. Of course, the recoil of a gun weighing two hundred tons, when fired with nearly one thousand pounds of powder would be something tremendous."

"Do the improvements in armor keep pace with those in guns?"

"Well, they are now using armor for turreted vessels, of a thickness of about twenty-six to twenty-eight inches. Yet they are able to make guns that will pierce that."

"How about dynamite guns and torpedoes."

"That is still in an experimental stage. The year past has demonstrated the possibility of throwing a shell containing a great quantity of dynamite a distance of a mile or so, and exploding it against a vessel. But some of the experiments have led to a doubt as to the effectiveness of the dynamite when exploded against the side of a vessel in this way. It is still in the experimental stage. — Washington Cor. Cincinnati Times.

Points in a Good Horse.

A horse's head indicates his character very much as a man's does. Vice is shown in the eye and mouth; intelligence in the eye and in the pose, in the mobile nostril and active ear. The size of the eye, the thinness of the skin, making the face bony, the large, open, thin-edged nostril, the fine ear, and the thin, fine mane and foretop, are indicative of high breeding, and accompany a high-strung, nervous organization, which, with good limbs and muscular power, insures a considerable degree of speed in the animals. The stupidly lazy horse that drivers call a "lunkhead" has a dull eye, usually a narrow head and contracted poll. He is always a blunderer, forgets himself and stumbles on smooth ground, get himself and his owner into difficulty, calks himself, is sometimes positively lazy, but often a hard goer. He needs constant care and watchfulness on the driver's part. A buyer of equine flesh should be able to detect the good and bad qualities of the animal he contemplates purchasing. This valuable knowledge is only acquired by a careful study of the various parts of horse physiognomy.—Farmer's Advocate.

THE PATENT FIEND.

He Invents a Safety Shoe Which Lands Him in a Safe Resort.

"Want to make $50,000 this winter?" queried a hawk-eyed man with a lap-shoulder to a shoe-dealer on Michigan avenue yesterday.

"Of course."

"Then buy my patent."

He unrolled a package and brought to light a shoe, a tin funnel and a quart of wood ashes.

"What on earth is it?" asked the dealer.

"It is Bronson's Patent Safety Shoe. Here's the idea: In winter our sidewalks are dangerous from ice. By sprinkling ashes on ice you produce decomposition and render travel safe. Do you follow?"

"But——?"

"Of course you don't, but I'll explain. This is a double-soled shoe. There is a space between the two soles, and the toe and heel ends are open. You fill this space with ashes and as you walk it flips out in advance of you."

"The idea!"

"Yes, I worked twenty-two years on the idea. The funnel fits into the heel of the shoe, and is used to load up with."

"But the ashes?"

"O, you hire a boy to follow you with a pail of them. When the shoe is empty you whistle and he loads it up again. There's nothing like it. I can walk twenty miles a day over a perfect glare of ice. Will you give me an order?"

"No, sir. It's the most ridiculous thing I ever heard of."

"It is, eh! You'll see whether it is or not before the winter is over! I'll sell enough to buy you out and throw your stock into the river!"

An hour later he was arrested for being drunk and hilarious, and as he went down in the wagon he was explaining to the officer:

LONDON'S PET GORILLA.

The Baby from the Tropics Proves to Be a Gloomy Little Fellow.

The unpleasant idea that must arise in the mind of a visitor to the gorilla which has been comfortably housed in the Zoological Society's gardens, Regent's Park, will probably be that he ought to be spoken of as our young relation. The missing link, it is true, may yet be wanting, but it is humiliating to be forced, after watching the newcomer, and the Chimpanzee Sally, in the next cage, to the conclusion that the hairy creatures behind the bars and the nineteenth-century people in front of them have much in common. Our young gorilla is, of course, at present, the curiosity par excellence at the Zoo. This is his indisputable right, because of his rarity.

The successful prolongation of Chimpanzee Sally's life to the fourth year gives hope that the gorilla may also be kept in the land of the living to be petted, admired, argued about and to be called (to its face) a great troglodyte and an anthropomorphous ape. Our young gorilla does not, so far, impress us as being of a happy or contented disposition. Small wonder, indeed, is there for his melancholy. He voyaged from the Gaboon in a wretched box with scarce room to move, and arrived from Liverpool at the Zoological Gardens terribly knocked about, and, of course suffering from a cold that it was feared would be the forerunner of that pulmonary disease which so generally proves fatal to the tropic-born anthropoids. The chimpanzee, coming also from gorilla land, had been very good practice for Mr. Bartlett, who accordingly nursed the gorilla with almost parental care, and has had the satisfaction of seeing him recover health and in some measure become reconciled to his captivity. The animal has all the characteristic marks of the true gorilla, and it is a great advantage to the natural-history student to have the opportunity of making comparisons between him and the chimpanzee. Which of the two is most human in appearance will probably be a matter of opinion. Sally is tame, and even playful. She understands what her keeper says to her, and has been taught by him to count straws up to five. She is fond of being noticed and will thrust out her paw, with its long filbert nails, to grasp the hand of a stranger. The gorilla as yet will make friends with none, but he will occasionally be tempted at the sight of a bunch of grapes to come forward and sulkily pick up and eat the fruit thrown in among the straw. By and by he may emerge from his sullen fit and permit himself to be handled like his distant relative next door. After all, he is, being three years of age, but a baby, and there is ample time for the ameliorating influences of kind treatment (not to mention the courses of bananas, grapes, and an occasional pineapple to which he is meanwhile treated) to soothe his savage and remarkably broad breast. Sally is more human, at least in her diet, than the gorilla, for she has no objection to meat, and will tear to pieces and make very short work with a pigeon. The gorilla's appetite has naturally to be a good deal humored in these early days, when the luscious fruits and berries of his native forests have not been quite forgotten. The atmosphere of the house in which these large apes reside, which is on the north side of the gardens (opposite the kangaroos), is kept at about seventy degrees, and the cages of both gorilla and chimpanzee are roomy apartments, furnished as appropriately as can be expected under the circumstances. The gorilla will mostly be found crouched upon the straw at the remote end of his house, with his arms clasped behind his head, and the stolid expression of his flat face and dark eyes expressive of a settled gloom. There is in his demeanor at such times a real touch of nature that makes him kin with all who have been unhappy. The young naturalist who studies this young specimen should supplement his visit to the gardens by another to the Natural History Museum, where a stuffed adult specimen will be found. —London Daily News.

Who Struck Billy Patterson.

About forty years ago, at one of the medical colleges of this country, the students had a trick of hazing every new man who entered the institution. They would secure him hand and foot, carry him before a mock tribunal, and there try him for some high crime with which they charged him. He would be convicted, of course and sentenced to be led to the block and decapitated. A student named William Patterson came along in time, and was put through the court and sentenced in the usual solemn and impressive manner. He was blindfolded and led to the block, and his neck placed in position. The executioner swung his axe and buried it in the block, allowing it, to be sure, to go nowhere near Patterson's head. The students laughed when the trick was at an end, but Patterson was dead. He had died from what medical men call shock. All the students were put under arrest, and the question arose, "Who struck Billy Patterson?" On the trial it was shown that nobody struck him, but the medical students retained the expression, and it has come down through them to the present day.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

CARDINAL MANNING.

The Favorable Impression He Made on an American Visitor.

Not much of the pomp and splendor of the Roman purple here, I thought, as I stood at the entrance of a large but severely plain house, of no particular style of architecture, within a short walk of the Houses of Parliament. Yet this was the episcopal residence—the titular palace of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster. I had some trouble in finding the place. A policeman who was sunning himself around the next corner said he had never heard of Cardinal Manning.

The door of the mansion was opened by a middle-aged woman, very plainly dressed. I entered a wide hall which was almost destitute of furniture. The woman who had admitted me opened a door to the right, and I found myself in a large well-lighted library, the sides of which were filled with book-cases reaching from the floor to the ceiling, and containing about 10,000 volumes of works in every department of literature, although theology, philosophy and history predominated.

The furniture of the Cardinal's library was of the plainest kind, consisting of an oblong table, half a dozen leather seat chairs, and a cheap carpet of a neutral tint. On the walls were several pictures, among which I noticed portraits of Pius IX., Leo XIII., Cardinal Wiseman and King Edward the Confessor.

While I was turning over the pages of a work on the Roman antiquities the library door opened, and a tall, slender, delicate figure glided into the room. The small red cap told me I was in the presence of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminister, Henry Edward Manning. His simple, gentle manners made me feel at home at once. His voice was singularly sweet and winning, but exquisitely modulated.

I found the Cardinal deeply interested in the United States. Like many of his intelligent countrymen, he looks upon America as the country of the future, where the mental and the physical development of mankind are destined to attain their perfection. The Cardinal is greatly interested in the temperance cause, and attributes most of the misery of the poorer classes to the vice of intemperance. The Irishman drinks from joviality, the Englishman from brutality, and it is easier to reform an Irish than an English drunkard.

It is not generally known that Cardinal Manning was a married man. While an Arch-deacon in the Church of England he married Miss Serjeant, whose two sisters married Bishop Wilberforce and Henry Wilberforce, his brother. Mrs. Manning lived only a few months after her marriage, and her death filled the sensitive soul of her husband with a deep and lasting sorrow, and turned him more and more to a life of entire spirituality. Cardinal Manning was born in 1809, the same year that witnessed the birth of Alfred Tennyson. His father was a member of Parliament and Governor of the Bank of England. Young Manning, after a preparatory education at Harrow, entered Balliol College, Oxford, where he distinguished himself no less by his scholarship than by the polish of his manners. He became a fellow of Merton College at the early age of twenty-four, and Archdeacon of Chichester before he was thirty-three. At that age the future Cardinal Archbishop seemed very far from the Catholic Church, for just at that time he preached so violent a tirade against "Popery" that Dr. Newman, who was then preparing to join the church, declined to see him the next time he called. While holding orders in the Church of England, Dr. Manning maintained the spiritual grace of baptism, and when this doctrine was denied by Mr. Gorham, and the view of the latter was pronounced tenable by the Church of England, Manning "felt the very ground on which he stood cut from under him," and shaking from his feet the dust of the church of his ancestors entered the Church of Rome. His rise was rapid. He founded the order of Oblates of St. Charles of Borromeo, was raised to provost of Westminister, and became a great favorite of Cardinal Wiseman, who recommended him to the Holy See as worthy of the honorary title of Monsignor. When Wiseman died, in 1865, Pope Pius IX. raised Monsignor Manning to the vacant See of Westminster, and in 1875 he was created a Cardinal.

Cardinal Manning is a frequent guest at luxurious banquets, but the ascetic churchman in the midst of such feasts makes his dinner off a baked potato, a piece of beef, and a glass of water. The Cardinal is an early riser, getting up at five in summer and six in winter. After half an hour's meditation, he says mass in his private chapel, and then passes thirty minutes in thanksgiving. He breakfasts at seven in summer and eight in winter, and then passes an hour or two over his correspondence, and devotes the rest of the morning to literary work, and to matters belonging to his archdiocese.—Eugene L. Didier, in Epoch.

—John Buckley, of Meriden, Ct., caught a snapping turtle and took it to the telephone office, where he works. He thought that he would kill the animal by electricity, and so put the end of a wire in front of it, and the turtle snapped it and held on. Then Buckley put another wire under the shell and turned on the entire electric circuit of the office. The turtle shut his jaws tighter and closed his shell, and in five minutes was apparently as dead as Julius Cæsar, but the next morning he was walking about the office quite hearty. He had received an electric shock powerful enough to kill a man.

OLD SQUIRE BEASLEY.

The Officiating Genius of the Famous Gretna Green of America.

The village of Aberdeen, O., directly opposite this city, has become famous within the last quarter of a century as the Gretna Green of America. More couples are married there in a year than in many large cities of the country. It is the haven of runaway lovers from Kentucky, although couples go there from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and even New York. Aberdeen is a pretty place of about nine hundred inhabitants. It is situated on the Ohio river, sixty-one miles above Cincinnati, and is reached by steamer and ferry-boat. The town is a leading tobacco market. Runaway marriages have become so frequent at Aberdeen that the people pay no attention to them. There are sometimes six or seven weddings a day. The veteran marrying 'Squire is Massie Beasley, who is now seventy-seven years old. He has held his present office continuously for twenty years, and is always re-elected without opposition. Every grade of society appears before 'Squire Beasley to have the hymeneal knot tied. He is a good-hearted old fellow, and if the pair have no money to pay the fee, which is often the case, he dismisses them with his blessing. Some of the couples arrive in carriages and are dressed in silks and broadcloth. Others enter his office barefooted and in rags, but the 'Squire never turns them away, no matter how forlorn or pitiable their condition. He marries people at the dead of night when they are in a hurry to escape the wrath of pursuing fathers or brothers.

'Squire Beasley's office has furnished many sensations which never got into the newspapers. On two or three occasions the wedding has been harshly interrupted by the arrival of pursuers just in time to prevent the ceremony. The age of applicants for his services makes no difference to Mr. Beasley. He has united boys of thirteen and girls of eleven, but up to this time he has never been involved in any trouble. The oldest pair to enter matrimony before the marrying 'Squire was a man of eighty and a woman of seventy-two. It had been a wonder how many mere children could be wedded without making the justice liable to fine and imprisonment. It seems that Beasley is a law unto himself. He asks no questions, and aims to make every body happy without regard to age or color. Most of his patrons are from Kentucky, and the marriage laws of that State are decidedly crude and indefinite. Within the last five years West Virginia has sent many of her young people to Aberdeen to be married. 'Squire Beasley has tied the knot for 4,153 couples in the sixteen years of his career in that time. His predecessor, 'Squire Shelton, who has been dead many years, married 5,000 couples in his life. In thirty years nearly 10,000 pairs of lovers have been made happy or miserable in Aberdeen.

'Squire Beasley is youthful in spirits, being a man of fine social qualities. His office is at his residence, a two-story brick, just on the outskirts of the town. There, with his only son, Captain Tom Beasley, he keeps bachelor's hall. The room used for matrimonial purposes is large and attractive. It contains an old-fashioned book-case and table, cozy arm-chairs, a bedstead, and the 'Squire's pet mocking bird. The experiences of Mr. Beasley prove that people will undergo almost any hardship to get married. The runaways knock at his doors at all hours of the night in the worst of weather. They come on horseback and on foot, frequently being only a few minutes ahead of the infuriated father.

The records of the 'Squire's office show that Lewis County, Kentucky, sends the most runaways to Gretna Green, although every county in that State is well represented in his register. Ohio couples are required to produce a license, and in this way Mr. Beasley saves himself from being amenable to the laws of that State.

Although 'Squire Beasley is a jovial fellow, he is aggravatingly reticent about his career as a dispenser of matrimonial bonds. He has refused repeatedly to be interviewed on the subject and will not have his picture taken. The 'Squire keeps his records, not in a book, but on slips of paper. He says it is nobody's business who the people are that come to him to get married, and he will not reveal any of the many interesting secrets of which he is the possesssor. A newspaper man once offered him a $100,000 for two of his pictures and an interview, but he positively declined to consider the proposition. Mr. Beasley has made several thousand dollars as the result of his reputation as the marrying 'Squire of America.—Maysville, (Ky.) Cor. Chicago Tribune.

—The coasts of Lower California abound with huge turtles, which weigh from 300 to 400 pounds each. Down at Punta Banda, where a company is building a large hotel, one of the workmen, who is an expert swimmer and who spends much time in the water, has become skillful in riding the big animals. A traveler says that when the man sees one that is big enough to ride, he rushes into the water and mounts it. He has a way of slapping the turtles on the side of the head that makes them jog along, and, by striking them, he also guides them. He rode a big fellow near the shore the other day as the stage drove up the coast road, and the occupants of the stage were so pleased with the exhibition that they made up a purse of $20 for the rider.

A Strong Speech.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23.—In the Senate to-day Mr. Hoar presented the petition of the Governor of Massachusetts, the Mayor of Boston, president of colleges and a large number of other distinguished persons representing a mass-meeting held in Tremont Temple on the 12th of November last, to welcome the British peace deputation. He tated that this British deputation represented a majority (he believed) of the members of the British Parliament, and a large number of persons of rank and influence and distinction of that country.

Mr. Frye called up the motion to refer to the Committee on Finance the President's annual message and proceed to discuss the message in which he said the President had clearly thrown down the gauntlet of free-trade. There was an attempt, he admitted, at disguise, but so feeble that it ought not deceive anyone. That message had been received with unbounded joy in Great Britian, and why not? England had been seeking the American market for years with a persistency which never flagged, a courage which never failed, a faith never hopeless, although for a quarter of a century she has seen her aggressions met by strong defences. But now the President of the United State declared that these defences were to be erased. The British press had at once proceeded to self congratulations and to strip off mercilessly the President's disguise. These congretulations, he said, would have continued if a voice of warning had not been heard. The warning was that such English expression of opinion had to be curbed, or the full fruition of English hopes never would be enjoyed. He quoted from the Pall Mall Gazette to that effect, and said that immediately there had been a transformation. The trade papers of Great Britain had dropped, at once, their self congratulations and had proceeded to congratulate the United States and to prophesy unbounded prosperity for this country. Great Britain had seemed suddenly to recognize the fact that this country was her daughter, and to evince to her friendship and affection. He declared emphatically that England had never, in one single instance, evinced any sympathy for this country, and that they never had permitted an opportunity to thus injure this country to pass unimproved. He declared that the counsel, the advice, the friendship of Great Britain to any Nation in commercial matters had invariably and inevitably resulted in injury to the Nation which had accepted it. Ireland was an instance of that and yet, he said, Great Britain hoped and the Democratic party expected the Irish votes next fall for Mr. Cleveland as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. One of the leading free trade speakers had declared years ago that the greatest triumph of Great Britain would be the subjugation of the United States. In the promise of the President's message they could see that subjugation nigh at hand.

Great Britain to-day had her market open to the world, while other countries has their markets partially closed to her. She found within her own borders the fiercest kind of competition; and her industries were falling off. Her silk industry, for instance, had been absolutely destroyed. Fifteen years ago there were 90,000 person employed in the silk industry in London, and to-day there were only 8,000. Her cotton manufactures were crippled; Germany and Belgium were seizing her iron and steel industries and were already controlling one-half of her foreign trade in that line. Her agricultural lands were decreasing in value, and from one-third to one-half of her agricultural laborers were out of employment, while those who had employment only earned from a shilling to one and six-pence a day.

He had heard the President of the United States declare in his annual message that the tariff (the only obstacle to English possessions of the American market) was vicious, illogical, inequitable, and what wonder that the English people deafened American ears with their cries of "hear, hear." They saw him adopt as the slogan of the Democratic party, for the Presidential battle of 1888, the old fundamental doctrine of free trade, that "duty is a tax paid by the consumer,"

What wonder that they hailed Mr. Cleveland as their champion? They saw some promise to open to them participation in the American market; and they knew that that participation would start their halting looms and feed their hungry unemployed men and women. What wonder that the approval of the President's message went ringing over the world?

The distinguished Speaker of the House (for whom he had a profound esteem) in his devotion to the principles of free trade, had dared in the last Congress to arrogate to himself almost despotic powers and to declare from his high place that he would recognize no member of the House to make any motion to cut down the surplus unless it was first submitted to a Democratic caucas. The Democratic Secretary of the Treasury had also joined in the choral song of free traders apparently with all his heart. In fine he was satisfied that all the Democratic leaders agreed with the President except that they had not the President's boldness or honesty. If, however, by cheating the people in the next election as to their position they could get a new lease of power and obtain control of the United States Senate, then the people might bid farewell to every principle of protection, The Republicans took up the President's gauntlet of free trade with great pleasure; and joined issue with the Democrats.

The Republicans declared that instead of the tariff being vicious, illogical and inequitable it increased marvelously the prosperity of this country, and that instead a duty being a tax paid by the consumer, no instance could be found in which the duty had not decreased to the consumer the cost of the article consumed. The Republicans further declare that the future prosperity of this country for twenty-five years at any rate depended absolutely upon the benign influences of a protective tariff. He admitted that this country possessed many advantages over competing Nations, but he declared that with all these advantages it could not compete in manufactures with the European Nations, because it was handicapped in the matter of wages. On this point and on the additional point that the price of all manufactured articles had diminished under the protective system. Mr. Frye supported his argument with numerous illustrations, many of them drawn from his own observations in Europe. As to the surplus it was Democratic in capacity, he said, which caused it, and now the country had to look out to see that the same Democratic incapacity in administering medicine, did not give poison and kill the patient. He was as much against the surplus as the President was, but he was not frightened at it. He would rather have a surplus than a deficit. If there was any honest purpose to get rid of the surplus, it could be done without the slightest difficulty. In the first place some of it ought to be expended wisely in coast defences, in increasing the navy, in building up the merchant marine, and in educating the people.

As Mr. Frye concluded there was considerable applause from some of the galleries, which were well filled and he was congratulated by several Senators.

The Word of "Uniform."

President Peter of the State on Tuesday of last week laid before that body the reply of Attorney-General Whyte to the resolution asking for his opinion on the constituality of the proposed election laws in reference to the word "Uniform," as used in the constitution. Mr. Whyte in substance said:

The Court of appeals, (26 Md., 449,) has laid down a canon of construction in regard to the constitution which furnishes an easy guide to its correct interpretation, unlike the acts of the Legislature. The constitution owes its whole force and authority to its ratification by the people, and they judge of it by the meaning apparent on its face. According to the general use of the words employed, where they do not appear to have a legal or technical sense, but in accordance with the popular understanding the word "uniform," as used in the fifth section of article 1, of the constitution, was not used in any strained or technical sense, but in its commonsense signification it simply means that the registration all over the State shall be on the same general plan, in the same mode, or consistent in its general requirements. It provides for an uniform registration not a simultaneous one. So while it distinctly states that the registration shall be of one form or in like manner, that instrument is silent as to the time and places when and where such registration shall be accomplished, thus leaving to the Legislature the absolute power of making suitable and resonable regulations not calculated to impair or defeat the right of voting, but to facilitate and secure its honest exercise. It will be seen that the Legislature is in no way restricted in fixing different times when registration shall be had in Baltimore city and in the several counties. The act of 1882, chapter 22, under which the existent registration was made, provides days upon which registration is to be made in the city of Baltimore and which are entirely distinct from those in the counties. Where, then, says the attorney-general can there be an infraction of the constitutional provision in providing different years in the city and counties for the like purpose? The Court of Appeals in the case of the commissioners of public schools of Allegany county (20 Md., 457) set its face against any strained or ironclad construction of the word "uniform." The attorney-general then quotes from the opinion in this case, and says the same reasons apply for a similar construction of the word "uniform" in connection with registration.

Pretty Stories Not all Proved.

These are facts, my masters, not at all carrying out the pretty pictures of the story writers, whose girly girls in family disaster and loss of property have only to pick up their pens and write a magazine article, or go into fruit raising or bee-keeping, and buy a farm and new furnish the house the first season on the profits. Might these redoubtable young women but condescend to give the rest of the world some inkling of their secret success? Every year the competition of real life grows more intence, till no favorite with gifts and genious feels secure in her place, or keeps it but at cost of sleepless vigilance and effort.

The thousand successes are offset by tens of thousands of women to whom life is a constant strain of body and thought, with only lightening enough of the toil to be endurable. It is enough to know, from medical reports, that the majority of cultivated women are aged at 50, with the wrinkles and gray hair fit for 75, and soon after die of overstrain, or break down in mind. Imbecility and hysteria increase, to say nothing of insanity, while the standard of effective labor, intellectual and physical, rapidly lowers, because the stamina of the race is worn out.—Cosmopolitan.

"Why, Sammy," said a farmer to his little son the other day. "I didn't know that your teisher whipped you last Friday." "I guess," he replied, "if you'd been in my trousers you'd a know'd it."

The world owes us a living, but we have to enforce payment.

The BALTIMORE WEEKLY SUN continues to preserve its position, maintained for many years, as a model Family Newspaper. During the past year, in order to accommodate the great variety of matter seeking admission to its columns, it has been found necessary to issue a Supplement almost every week, presenting a home newspaper unequaled for freshness and variety. Its literary features are selected with discriminating taste and with special reference to the entertainment and instruction of the family circle. Its Agricultural and Veterinary Departments, edited by specialists, have been of great value to the Farmer, while its Fashion Articles, Household Recipes, etc., have continued to be a source of weekly interest and instruction to ladies. The latest news up to the hours of publication is given in its correspondence and telegraphic dispatches, while its editorials, besides discussing current events in an impartial spirit, afford much wholesome advice and suggestion on social, economic and other topics. The proceedings of Congress, the Maryland and other Legislatures, the National Political Conventions, and the Presidential and Congressional elections are among the important features that will be promptly and copiously presented in its columns during 1888.

A Great National Journal.

THE NEW YORK

Mail and Express

The Advocate of the Best Interests of the Home—The Enemy of the Saloon. The Friend of American Labor. The Favorite Newspaper of People of Refined Tastes Everywhere.

For many years the daily edition of the New York MAIL AND EXPRESS has been recognized as the leading afternoon paper of the metropolis, while its weekly edition has been THE FAVORITE HOME PAPER in thousands of families in every State in the Union. It has attained its great popularity and influence by its enterprise in the collection of news, the purity of its tone, and the ability and courage of its advocacy of the Right on all questions of public interest.

FOR 1888 the MAIL AND EXPRESS will be a better paper than ever, and, as a clean, interesting, instructive

Home Newspaper,

it solicits comparison with any other in the country. It is one of the LARGEST PAPERS PUBLISHED anywhere, and spares neither labor nor expense to secure for its readers the very best in all departments of newspaper literature.

OUR POLITICS.

We believe the Republican party to be the true instrument of the POLITICAL PROGRESS of the American people; and holding that the honest enforcement of its principles is the best guarantee of the national welfare, we shall support them with all our might; but we shall always treat opposing parties with consideration and fair play.

AGAINST THE SALOON.

The MAIL AND EXPRESS is the recognized leading journal of the country in the great Anti-Saloon Republican movement. It believes that the liquor traffic as it exists to-day in the United States is the enemy of society, a fruitful source of corruption in politics, the ally of anarchy, a school of crime, and, with its avowed purpose of seeking to corruptly control elections and legislation, is a menace to the public welfare and deserves the condemnation of all good men.

In brief, all who wish to have in their homes a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER of national scope, broad views, clean pages and courageous, yet kindly, utterances on all questions of general public interest, will not be disappointed in the MAIL AND EXPRESS, and we respectfully solicit their influence and support.

CONSTIPATION

IS called the "Father of Diseases," because there is no medium through which disease so often attacks the system as by the absorption of poisonous gases in the retention of decayed and effete matter in the stomach and bowels. It is caused by a Torpid Liver, not enough bile being excreted from the blood to produce Nature's own cathartic, and is generally accompanied with such results as

Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache,
Bad Breath, etc.

The treatment of Constipation does not consist merely in unloading the bowels. The medicine must not only act as a purgative, but be a tonic as well, and not produce after its use greater costiveness. To secure a regular habit of body without changing the diet or disorganizing the system

"My attention, after suffering with Constipation for two or three years, was called to Simmons Liver Regulator, and, having tried almost everything else, concluded to try it. I first took a wineglassful and afterwards reduced the dose to a teaspoonful, as per directions, after each meal. I found that it had done me so much good that I continued it until I took two bottles. Since then I have not experienced any difficulty. I keep it in my house and would not be without it, but have no use for it, it having cured me."—GEO. W. SIMS, Ass't Clerk Superior Court, Bibb Co., Ga.

A WINTER VACATION.

It was not at all creditable to him, but it was nevertheless a fact that Tom Bronson went down to East Wheelerville on a two weeks' midwinter vacation in a recklessly flippant mood, and deliberately intending to have a good time, whether or no.

"They're an awful backwoodsy set, you know," he had said to his friend, Ernest Wilson, a dignified young doctor, whom he took with him. "Oh, I don't mind saying it—Aunt Sally's only a step great-aunt, anyhow. Oh, yes, they're the real article, she and Uncle 'Rastus—cowhide boots and calico dresses, and rag carpets and pumpkin pie, and all that sort of thing. We'll have lots of fun!"

"I don't propose to 'have fun' at the expense of your relatives, Bronson, and I trust you don't," the doctor had rejoined, reprovingly; at which Tom had merely laughed.

The doctor need not have concerned himself. Tom's ironical mood lasted about half an hour after their arrival in East Wheelerville, and vanished for good.

Uncle 'Rastus met them at the station with a lumber wagon and a cordial "How be you?" and twenty minutes later they were sitting, washed and hungry, at Aunt Sally's supper-table, with Uncle 'Rastus dishing ham and eggs, and Aunt Sally, stout and benevolently beaming, turning a tin of biscuits in the oven.

Tom called the attention of his friend, in subdued tones, to the picture of George Washington on the wall, and the yellow almanac under it, and to the tin tea-pot and the mug of teaspoons, and the absence of butter-plates.

"They don't have dining-rooms in East Wheelerville, you know," he murmured, with a chuckle. "They eat in the kitchen year in and year—"

"Susy," called Aunt Sally, as she put the hot, brown biscuits on the table, "you can bring the strained honey, too; mebbe they'll like some o' that."

There was a rustle in the pantry, its half-shut door swung back, and through it, bearing in one hand an amber-hued bottle, and in the other a blue plate and a trickling slice of honeycomb, came a girl in a long gingham apron—a dark-eyed, yellow haired, fair-faced, startlingly pretty girl.

Tom dropped his fork, and stared with open eyes and mouth. Wilson with greater presence of mind, only looked admiringly over the milk-pitcher.

"This is Susy Harkness," said Aunt Sally, with brisk cordiality and straight-forward phrasing. "Susy, this is my nephew, Tom Bronson; and this is Doctor Wilson, a friend o' his he's brought."

The young men rose and bowed; and Susy sat down, and deftly and gracefully dished the honey, and smilingly passed it.

Tom sat staring, with dazzled eyes; and continued to stare during the three-quarters of an hour of supper-time.

He was distinctly aware of nothing save the astonishingly pretty face opposite.

He could not have been more dazed and confused had a heavenly being dropped through the ceiling.

A stunning girl in East Wheelerville, and at Aunt Sally's! Who was she?

Tom looked at the gingham apron. It was hard to believe;" but the fact seemed indisputable. He knew that servants always ate with the family in the country. But he remembered Aunt Sally's last "help"—a sleepy, dough-faced girl, with shoes down at the heel.

Where had this—this angel come from? Whew! but how pretty she was!

Tom did not know whether he was eating or not; but he thought he was probably making a passable pretense, since nobody was observing him particularly.

They were talking—Uncle 'Ratus, Aunt Sally, Wilson and she. How sweet she looked when she talked! And the doctor was conversing with her quite calmly and rationally.

Tom was dimly amazed at his cold-bloodedness. He rose from the table slowly, since the rest were doing so, and submitted to being led into the sitting-room, with his head screwed backward to get a last glimpse of Aunt Sally's charming hired-girl, who was swiftly clearing the table.

"Well!" he burst forth, sinking into a chair by the glowing stove, and gaping at his friend.

His flippancy was gone; his jocose sarcasm was a thing of the past. He was deeply serious.

"Well?" said the doctor, collectively.

"Good gracious!" said Tom, explosively; "did you ever see such a darling?"

"Oh, the cook!" said Wilson, shutting the stove-damper. "Yes, she's pretty. But don't lose your head over a pretty girl, Bronson; the woods are full of them!

Wilson picked up a "Life of Washington" from the table and began to read it; and Tom, after a drearily wistful pause, stole into the kitchen.

Susy stood at the sink with her sleeves rolled to her plump elbows, washing dishes. Aunt Sally was stirring yeast and warm water into a pan of flour at the table.

"Oh, let me help!" Tom implored, looking beseechingly into Susy's dark eyes.

"Help?" she repeated, laughingly.

But Tom was in earnest. He caught an apron of Aunt Sally's from a nail, tied it around him, and seized a dish towel.

Susy laughed sweetly; Aunt Sally chuckled till her stout sides shook.

"You'll see I'm an adept!" said Tom, confidently.

He felt he could be an adept at flying, with such an inducement.

Indeed, he rubbed the forks and polished the glasses till they shone.

"Do you like housework, Susy?" he said softly.

Susy looked astonished—did she also look displeased?—and did not reply. Tom made another attempt, affrightedly.

"Have you been with Aunt Sally long?" he said. "I—I am so glad she can have such good help. It isn't always to be procured, you know."

He meant this to please and flatter her, and he thought he was successful.

She turned her pretty head away quickly; and when she turned back her charming face was softly flushed, and she was smiling. Aunt Sally was in the pantry.

"Yes, I am glad to be with her," she said, simply.

"East Wheelerville is beautiful, isn't it?" said Tom, elated at his success.

At that moment he sincerely considered East Wheelerville even more than beautiful.

"I like it," Susy rejoined, bringing more hot water in a tin dipper.

"I suppose you've been brought up here?" said Tom in low and sentimental tones—Aunt Sally was back at the table.

Susy murmured something, with her head bent over the dishes, which their rattle drowned.

"Happy East Wheelerville—to have been your native place!" Tom with a look which, an hour ago, he would have set down as idiotically soft.

"Oh, thank you!" said the hired girl, prettily, washing the last pan.

The evening flew by at a lightning spped, so it seemed to the enthralled young man. He helped Susy put away the dishes, and hung the dish-pan on a hook that was too high for her, and held the dust-pan while she "brushed up;" and then they went into the sitting-room and played a delicious game of dominoes by themselves, while Aunt Sally knit, and Uncle 'Rastus and the doctor talked politics; and talked all the rest of the evening, after Wilson had gone up stairs and while Uncle 'Rastus dozed.

Wilson was awakened by a sharp shaking at half-past ten.

"See here—wake up! I want to talk," said Tom, sitting down on the doctor's feet. "See here, Wilson—I'm gone this time!"

"Where?" said the doctor, sleepily.

"I'm in love! Yes—no fooling. I'm going to marry her if I can get her!"

"Who?"

"Why, Susy!" cried Tom, wildly.

The doctor sat up, fully roused.

"Susy!" he echoed, sternly: "your aun'ts servant girl! Are you crazy, Bronson? What will your people say? But, pshaw, you're talking bosh!"

Wilson lay down again.

"Bosh?" cried Tom, almost deliriously. "You'll see! Bosh? I'd marry her if she was only a crossing sweeper. She's the loveliest, sweetest creature in the world. I'll have her if I die for it!"

Wilson laughed dryly.

"You're crazy," he repeated. "You will be over it by morning. If you ain't, I'll put you into an ice-pack."

And he went to sleep in the middle of a second frantic protest from the excited lover.

But Tom was not "over it" by the next morning—nor by the end of the first week.

That was a hard week for the doctor.

"Yon're making a fool of yourself, Bronson," he said, almost tearfully, several times a day, "What will your mother say, and all the rest of them? You don't really mean to go any further with it? Come now, be sensible. You want a girl that's your equal in birth and fortune when you do marry; not a poor and uneducated girl you'd be ashamed of. Don't Bronson."

"Ashamed of!" Tom would retort hotly. "You don't know her, Wilson. Ashamed of her? Never! I'm going to have her if it's a possible thing.

And he would stride off, generally in the direction of the kitchen.

The climax came on the morning of the eighth day. The doctor had taken a walk, and was changing his muddy boots in his room, when Tom bounded in, breathless, and excitedly red in the face.

"She's mine!" he shouted, leaping across the room. "She's mine! Do you hear?"

Tne doctor, in a spirit half of irony and half of real alarm, sprinkled a handful of water from the pitcher on the young man's head.

"We're engaged!" Tom went on pantingly. "Not quite, you know; she says she's only known me a week, and she won't call it an engagement; but she'll think about it and she'll write to me, and—oh, it's as good as settled!"

"Is it," said the doctor grimly. "I guess not—not till I've made an effort to undue it. You're young and hot-headed, Bronson"—the doctor was two months the senior—"and I am going to prevent your making the worst mistake a fellow of your family and fortune could make. I'm going to let your people know what you're doing."

And five minutes later he was rearrayed in his overcoat and muddy boots, and was going down stairs followed by Tom, pourihg forth a tirade of mingled remonstrance and defiance.

The sitting room door stood open.

"Here she is," said Tom, forgetting everything but his happiness, and flying in to join Aunt Sally's charming hired girl on the sofa.

Aunt Sally sat in the largest rocker, her good-natured face was glowing with pleasure, and she burst out into a serenely delighted speech at the sight of Tom.

Wilson paused in the doorway to hear her, with a stern frown which gradually faded.

"Wal, Susy's been tellin' me all about it," taking off her glasses in her enshusiasm, "an' I don't know jest when I've so glad o' anything. I told Susy, fust night she come, I did hope you'd take a fancy to each other. I've allus been afraid Susy'd have to marry to suit her pa, and not her own self. Her pa's allus been set on her marryin' somebody with money. He says, out and, the match would be onequal if she didn't. Susy havn' so much in her own right and he bein' so rich, he wan't goin' to have her takin' up with no poor young man if he knew it. I do consider that money makes folks terrible proud and overbearin', though your pa's a well-meanin' man enough, Susy, and own cousin to 'Rastus."

The doctor was staring broadly: Tom was open mouthed.

"Own cousin!" he gasped. "Why—why—and Susy visiting you? Why I thought, Aunt Sally———"

The hired girl began to laugh.

"I knew you thought so," she cried, gaily; "and it was so funny I couldn't help letting it go that way, to see what you'd do. It was just like a ridiculous man to think, just because I had on Aunt Sally's apron and was helping her, that I was the 'girl.' Why, I had on my bracelets and all my rings that very evening, and a gold pin in my hair, and you never noticed. Oh, dear, it's been too much fun all along. And I didn't do it for that purpose, you know, like girls in stories; but I've found out that you like me for myself, anyhow."

The doctor looked wilted, and Tom with one arm around Susy's waist, turned to look at him, with a calm smile.

"I should have married her anyhow," he remarked confidently; and Wilson knew he would have.

The world may owe a man a living, but it is best to go out and collect it by a little work.

MY FIRST VALENTINE.

O, many long, long years ago
Whose lapse I'll not define,
When life was in its morning glow,
Came my first Valentine.
The breath of flow'rs, the song of birds,
Framed in and out with loving words.

Again, ah yes, and yet again
I mused upon the line—
A "poser" to my young heart then—
"O, be my Valentine."
But girt around with mystery's sheen,
I queried not what it might mean.

Nor was I with the problem tasked,
For—scorning mystic sign—
A handsome school boy next day asked:
"Where is your Valentine?"
With cheeks aglow and eyes ashine,
I answered: "What's a Valentine?"

"A Valentine. Why," stammered he,
"You half confuse a feller;
"'Tis when one loves a girl, you see,
"And takes this way to tell her.
"But look in 'Webster,' he will say,
"It means more yet: 'All lover's day.'"

O, little maid, your thirteen years
Suggested not a cover
To hide your face of smiles and tears
From such a knowing lover.
Who could assert with boyish glee:
"So I'll love you and you'll love me."

I'll single out from mem'ries dim
This, sealed with golden sign;
Thenceforth I had no name to him
Save this: "My Valentine."
And I, with thrill of guileless shame,
Under my breath, called him the same.

I dwell not on the years that passed,
When with life's fuller knowledge,
The laurels at his feet were cast,
Hard won from school and college.
And faith and hope beside him stood,
Each promising all future good.

Anon the war-cry thrilled again,
Its dark cloud dimmed our day;
And since the nation call'd for men
How could a hero stay?
Stay: with heart grand, stainless, true—
We bade godspeed "The boy in blue."

Too soon, from out the deadly frav,
They brought him, done with strife;
The brown curls on his forehead lay,
The lips smiled as in life.
But touched as with a seal divine,
They breathed no more "My Valentine."

I can not say I loved the boy—
For life was free and young—
But it will be with rapturous joy
If I but find among
The ransomed hosts, in glory's line,
My own, my long-lost Valentine.

MUTUAL IMPROVEMENT.

How Natty Proved Herself a St. Valentine Goose.

"Any one who does not recognize the opportunity St. Valentine gives one for speaking one's mind in a nice way to a friend is veritable out-and-out goose!" Nathalie threw her head up in a superior fashion that amused Phil.

"Well, a girl does delight in posing as a goose. Boys are rather ashamed of a likeness to the addle-pated fowl." Phil met superiority with superiority, and felt quite clever, on the whole. "I wouldn't make such a speech again, if I were you, Natty," he added, with kind patronage. "Of course every one knows, and has recognized the fact before you and I were born, that St. Valentine's Day has from time immemorial been the opportunity when one should unbosom himself, and speak of love's sweet dream and——"

"Love! O, Phil, you are the goose! Love! O, dear!"

Nathalie rushed across the room, and, in delighted derision, emphasized her epithet between him and his book.

"What in the world are you driving at?" he cried, crossly, and lifting a red face at her. "Didn't you say, yourself, that St. Valentine's day was the time to speak one's mind in a nice way to a friend—say?"

"Yes, but not about loving, and two hearts beating as one, and all that," said Nathalie, trying hard not to laugh at his face.

"Stuff and nonsense!" declared Phil, hotly. "Haven't I always railed at the day ever since I can remember? And now you are going to embroil me in a question over it. Only another reason why I wish St. Valentine had never been heard of!"

"Phillie," asked Nathalie, the laugh dropping out of face and tone, and covering the page with a firm little hand, "don't you think it can be done?" She peered earnestly into the countenance that presented a by no means conciliatory expression.

"What?"

"Don't you think a girl might say some things to her friends—real good friends, you know—that she has wanted to say to them all through the year; how she has noticed that they were not so sincere as they had been to her, and that they did not keep up in their classes, and their manners weren't so good as they used to be—things, Phillie, that girls ought to say to each other? Don't you think it could be done in a nice way in a valentine?" Nathalie searched his eyes anxiously.

"Whew! just you try it on if you want to get your head broken," cried Phil, pushing his chair away from book and table to look at her. "The idea of seizing that soft and tender season as an opportunity to sling a brick at a fellow—excuse me—a susceptible maiden! Just try it—that's all I say."

"Girls are not all such sillies as you make us out," cried Nathalie, loftily; and, drawing herself away in dignity, "you may not know it, but we have just formed a Mutual Improvement Society, Philip Carr, and we have agreed that we will take from each other whatever is said for our good. We ask to be criticised freely, and we have promised to think just as much as ever of any girl who tells us of our faults."

"May I be preserved from seeing the wrecks," cried Phil, "of broken friendships and dilapidated affections! In a week you'll be lucky if you get the girls to speak to you, if you set up this business. Take my advice, Natty, and have nothing to do with it," he said, more kindly.

"Indeed, I shall have something to do with it," declared Nathalie, perversely; "and a good deal, too. I've just bought ten sweet valentines, and I shall write it all as kind as can be and sign my name, just what I think I ought to say, to each of the girls, and they will thank me for it." She gave her brown curls a shake, and, her spirits rising, now that the decisive step was taken, she began to dance around the room to a gay little tune.

"Write out what you think of the other girls!" cried Philip. "Put it down in black and white! O, you goose—you St. Valentine goose!"

"I'll be a goose, then," cried Nathalie, bravely. "You'll see! It's you who will be the goose on the 14th of February, and you boys will follow our nice plan next year. I hope so; for it may improve you in a good many ways not mentioned now."

"Who are the ten girls you are going to send valentines to?" asked Philip, suddenly and ignoring all personal allusions. I hope and pray that they are good friends."

"They are just superb," cried Nathalie, searching for an adjective strong enough for her feeling. "They are true as steel, and they will love me all the better for my valentines. O, you'll see!"

"Who are they?" asked Philip, curiously.

"Mary Gay, Helen Hamersley, Louise Rice, Caroline Plympton, Trixie Hyde, Beth Morris, Flo Williams, Lucy and Maria Smith, and, of course, my—our cousin Sue. They are all just perfectly splendid, you can't deny that; and they are devoted to me."

"Go ahead, if you are determined to," cried Philip. "Only remember than I warned you."

She had already begun to "go ahead" just as his last words reached her, being occupied in scaling the stairs en route to the valentines, wrapped up in a dainty package, as they had come from the stationer's, and reposing in her upper bureau drawer.

Philip rubbed his head, thought a bit, pushed aside his book, scribbled off something that looked very much like ten names on a bit of paper, then, with a smothered laugh, hurried himself into his cap and coat, and took himself off to that region that always engulfs a boy when he is not to be found—"outdoors."

Nathalie, although publicly sneering at Love's devices, had privately lent herself to them, buying largely of most attractive Cupids and blazoned hearts, gilt and lace bordered flowers, and all the season's bewitchments that could be put into ten valentines.

"I hope they will like them," she said, spreading them out daintily over the bureau top, "though they do look awfully silly. Still, one must keep in fashion with the day, so I think they're all right. Now I'll give the biggest Cupid and those pink roses to Flo. That is rather the prettiest, and I want to tell her that I have noticed that her finger-nails aren't so perfectly exquisitely nice as they used to be; and that's a hard thing to say to a girl, especially when she had a manicure set given her only last Christmas. However, I must do my duty," Nathalie brought up, with a sigh.

The "biggest Cupid" soon smiled down benignly at these words, encircled in a wreath of wonderfully pink roses.

"DEAR FLO.—I think I ought to tell you that I saw a spot of ink on your middle finger last week, in geography class; and only two days ago I thought you hadn't polished your nails as you might, now you have that cunning little manicure set your Aunt Grace gave you.

"This is all written in love by your Valentine,
"NATHALIE CARR."

"That really looks quite kind and nice," declared Nathalie, regarding it with satisfaction. "What a splendid idea it is to send the notes on St. Valentine's Day! The girls will be so surprised. Now I'll write Maria Smith's next. She's everlastingly saying 'ain't' and 'got' when she don't need any thing besides 'I have.' I didn't realize before how she has annoyed me. It's really dreadful." So Maria's sweet valentine read this wise, folded into the protecting embrace of a bunch of violets as surprising in their way as the roses were:

"DEAR MARIA—I want to tell you that I think we should all be careful what words we use and not say 'ain't' for 'aren't' or 'am not;' and as for 'got,' it's perfectly dreadful to keep saying 'I have got any thing,' when 'I have any thing' would do just as well.

"With the greatest love, your Valentine,
"NATHALIE CARR."

"It looks a little harder than Flo's," communed Nathalie with herself, when she had finished, "but I had to say it, and I guess the violets will make up; they're lovely. Now I'll get Trixie's off my mind—she's always snuffing so disagreeably. I declare, when I think of it, I wonder I've kept so long from telling her of it. I'll give her this girl going down to the spring with a basket of flowers; it's too pretty for anything. I don't know why I should hate to tell Trixie she snuffs almost every word she says; ever so many of the girls complain of it." So Trixie's St. Valentine message ran this way, written by a pen getting quite in spirit with the idea of keeping a sharp lookout for the failings of friends:

"DEAR TRIXIE—I know I ought to tell you that you are getting worse than ever at snuffing. The other day, when you tried to tell me about Flora Briggs' new dress, you kept that disagreeable habit up every ten words. [Here Nathalie, considering herself not quite truthful, changed the "ten" to "five".] And if I don't tell you of it you'll just go on snuffing and snuffing until you get to be a young lady, and that would be perfectly horrid.

"With the most devoted love, your Valentine,
"NATHALIE CARR."

When Nathalie turned her back upon her ten completed valentinic messages of love, it was to carry an exhausted face and manner to the family supper-table. Philip cast a glance of ordinary interest at her as she took her place, and, beyond the silent pity of father and mother, who thought their girl studying too hard, the pale cheeks were unnoticed.

"It is a very hard piece of work to do," whispered Nathalie, as she passed Philip the bread, "but I know they will thank me. I'm sure I should if I were in their place."

"Um!" said Philip, in his unresponsive fashion, and then he began to talk about a new toboggan slide the boys were making on Collins Hill, directing his conversational efforts to his father, so that Nathalie, left out in the cold, fell back to a listless replying that she did not want any thing to eat, to all her mother's attempts that were now set in motion toward that end.

"You must be sick, daughter," at last said Mrs. Carr, "and I can't think of any thing better than for you to get into bed as early as possible." All the pleadings that Nathalie now began being of no avail the sturdy writer of the ten St. Valentine epistles was ignominiously set free from the supper-table, only to be put to bed at seven o'clock like a child.

It was probably this, however, that made her arise betimes the next morning, bright as a bee and bonny as a bird, with a rare delight in the new idea so successfully worked out the previous evening, and just as soon as the hearty breakfast was over, that tasted so good after her fast of the night before, she flew into her sack and hat, grasped her ten missives with a confident hand, and started to drop them, with a St. Valentine pull at the door bell, at the house of each friend.

"Going to be the letter-carrier?" cried Philip, following her to the door. "Why in time didn't you post the things?"

"O, it's twice the fun to tuck them under the doors and then run," cried Nathalie, with a cheek like the heart of a wild rose, and laughing gayly as she hurried down the street.

"Why don't you wait and see if you get any valentines?" shouted Philip after her, and craning his neck to get a last view of the flying figure—"it's nearly time for the postman."

"Save them all for me. Don't you dare to open one. I'll be home soon," came back on the wind, and Nathalie was off.

Philip came carefully in, shut the door, put his fingers in his mouth, and gave that terrific whistle that only boys can, that emits a tearing, ear-splitting sound, once heard never to be forgotten; then he felt better. Just at this moment a click and then a sharp pull at the bell made him turn abruptly around and rush to the letter-box.

"She's missed them by a hair's breadth," he cried. "One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten. Jolly! every girl's come to time as good as if she were a boy," dragging out a handful of smart valentines, each and every one addressed to Miss Nathalie Carr, 89 Clement avenue.

These he carefully placed on the library table, and then executed for his own diversion, around this center of attraction, a series of hops that would shame a Digger Indian of the best developed muscle, at last tearing himself away to occupy the time elsewhere, with both ears on the alert for Nathalie whenever she should come running in.

"I'm home," she cried, suddenly appearing in the door with the rosiest of faces. "It was royal fun, Phil!"

"How did you get in?" he cried, bounding forward in dismay.

"Came in the basement door; the marketman was just ringing, and I slipped in behind him and his basket."

"Have you been in the library?" asked Philip, nervously.

"No; I didn't stop. I was in such a hurry to tell you. It was just the loveliest fun I ever had. I guess I enjoyed it more because I did what I should want done to me, and wrote the girls just what I know is true."

"Yes, yes; well come on," said Philip, interrupting. "You've a lot of valentines in the library—came in the post, you know. Let's go down and look at them."

"Only a lot of sillies, I suppose," said Nathalie, with her most grown-up air, yet speeding with intense delight for the stairs. "Still, we might as well look at them and guess who sent them."

"That's so," said Philip, hurrying after.

"Oh! ah! oh!" Nathalie's eyes sparkled at the pretty heap, and her girl-heart swelled at the importance to which she was suddenly lifted. "Ten! Who could have sent them all?"

"Look and see," advised Philip; "that's the way a boy does when he gets a letter, but a girl oh's over an hour, and then spells out the postmark and guesses who it is from, another hour. Here's my knife."

"I'd rather take a hair-pin," said Nathalie. "I can do it twice as quickly," and she pulled at that necessary article, tumbling down half of her loose coils as the chief support was withdrawn.

"Take care! the whole thing will be down upon us if you don't look out," said Philip, regarding her head in alarm.

"Never mind! 'twill hold together till I get these open," laughed Nathalie, deftly doing duty with the hair-pin, in the way only a girl and a woman can, till the ten sealed envelopes were all laid open and ready to yield their contents, when the coils were shaken into place, and the little hair support run in through them again. "There," she said, with a satisfied breath, "now I'm ready to enjoy my valentines."

The loveliest bit of paper lace-work was withdrawn from its white cover, in the center revealing two hearts held fast by the arrow of fate, while all sorts of flowers bloomed around these two "beating as one."

"Who could have sent this!" cried Nathalie. "It's pretty, isn't it? Why, here is a perfect lot of writing inside," whirling over the page. "Philip Carr, Flo Williams sent this!"

"How do you know?" asked Phil.

"There, just see there!" Nathalie pointed to a pinched signature off in the farther corner. "What does she find to say to spin such a lot?"

"Read ahead and see," cried Philip.

"DEAREST NATHALIE," began the valentine receiver, in a tremor of delight that Flo, whom the girls always thought a bit cold and undemonstrative, should have finally developed an affectionate nature. "I think I ought to tell you that I have noticed lately that the buttons on your boots are falling off in weakness. Now you know that nothing so marks the lady as a trim boot, and really a needle and thread would help the difficulty ever so much.

"With the greatest love, I am your Valentine,
"FLO. WILLIAMS."

"My Valentine!" shriek Nathalie, her rosy cheeks trying to turn pale, and dashing the two hearts and the lace-work to the table. "The idea! What does she think I'm made of, to endure this? And it isn't so, Phil Carr; at least it was only once she saw me with just one little button off near the top, and I was in a hurry to go town for some caramels. So! And she's mean enough to pretend that I always go around with my boots hanging."

"O, no, Nathalie; I guess she doesn't mean that," said Philip, soothingly; "she only does it for your good."

"But I wouldn't care if it was true," cried Nathalie, stopping suddenly. "I'd be willing and glad to have her tell me; but it isn't true. She only saw me once."

"Well, open your others; perhaps they're better," suggested Phil.

Nathalie's eyes shone with their own pleasant light dancing in the brown depths as she saw Cousin Sue's handwriting.

"DEAREST NATHALIE—I feel quite sure that I ought to tell you that your unpleasant habit of giggling seems to be growing upon you. Now I shouldn't mention this, but, as I am a relation, I can say things that the other girls might not like to. So believe that I love you very much and take me for your Valentine.

"COUSIN SUE."

"Take her for my Valentine!" cried Nathalie, sharply; "indeed I won't. The idea, Philip Carr, of her doing this thing because she is a relative!"

"She only does it for your good," said Philip, taking refuge in the old remark, and only wishing that he might be preserved from bursting into a laugh.

"I could take it and love her all the same," cried Nathalie, with a grimace, "if she didn't seize the chance to tell me she is doing it because she is my relative. That makes it impossible for me to love her."

"Pull out number three," said Philip—"here, I'll do it," for Nathalie seemed to have little heart for further investigation. "This is from Trixie."

"What does she say?" asked Nathalie, faintly, with one eye on the smart epistle rattling in her brother's hand.

"I'm rather afraid to tell," said Philip, maintaining a grave face; "it's pretty hard."

"I think I can bear it," said Nathalie, drawing herself up stiffly, and wildly essaying to stop the quivering of her lip. "Go on, Phil; let me know the worst."

"She says you are saying things behind her back," began Philip, slowly, "and——"

"Saying things behind her back!" broke in Nathalie, with a sad wail, "when I—love—her—too! Oh—oh—oh!" and she dropped in a miserable little heap to the floor, sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Never mind, Nat, old fellow," cried Philip, in dismay, throwing the valentine after the first two, and bending over her; "don't cry; there's a good chap. Those girls ain't worth minding; they always were a silly lot."

But Nathalie wailed on.

"And it's only what you have written to them, or just as bad, I suppose. You know you promised to do your duty in this way, in your Mutual-go-at-each-other's-faults Society," said Philip, pounding her back in brotherly sympathy, "so bear it like a man."

"But I only wrote one to each girl," said Nathalie, faintly, "and I've ten. O, dear! dear!"

"That's only one apiece," said Philip, encouragingly, "and you can pitch back, and keep the fight going all the year, don't you see, and get your pay back."

Nathalie shuddered herself into a sitting posture, with eyes flashing and the reddest of cheeks. "I shall never, never say another thing about their faults so long as I live," she declared.

"Hey!"

"I couldn't, and live. I'm just as full as I can be of the hatefulest, ugliest feelings against every one of those girls, and I'm afraid I'll never get back where I was before. O, Phil, I feel like an old black snake."

"Well, you aren't," said Phil. "You're supposed to be better than you were before. It's an Improvement Society, you know."

"Improve"—Nathalie left the word helplessly in mid air, to jump to her feet and seize his hands. "Promise me that you won't ever speak that name to me again."

"If you won't look at the rest of these things," agreed Phil, pointing to the seven valentines.

Nathalie made a dash at them, and, with both hands full, rushed to the glowing hearth fire and threw them in the midst of the bright brands.

"That's my answer."

"The best thing done to-day," approved Phil. "Never hear a slighting thing when you can help it. That's my way."

The firelight was not brighter than the girl's cheeks. "Get my hat, Phillie, that's a good boy—I threw it on my bed—and my sack. I'm going to follow my valentines to each of the girls. O, how I wish I had them unread in my hand. I didn't know it hurt so to read what the other girls think of you."

"Go on, Natty. You're coming to. All right now."

"Hereafter I'll love all the harder every girl who has a fault that I can't help seeing," cried Nathalie. "Do get my sack and hat, Phil."

Instead, he took her hands and turned her around three times. "That's to get a new set of ideas. Now, you small goosie, it's all right about the girls' feelings. I fixed them when I got them to write up this mess." He pointed to the little curling heap of gray ashes in the heart of the fire.

"You!" Nathalie's brown eyes widened to their utmost.

"If you hadn't been so absorbed in reforming the world you'd have seen as plain as day that all I had to do, after you had kindly furnished me the names, was to march over to the girls' houses and ask them to return you the St. Valentine compliment."

"Oh!"

"It was something of a job to give up my Latin, and go on a trot like that," said Philip, in mild resignation, and getting a wise distance from her retributive fingers. However, I was willing to do it for my only sister, and——"

"A St. Valentine goose," finished Nathalie.—Margaret Sidney, in Christian Union.

TERRIBLE PENANCE.

Monks Scourge Their Bare Backs Until Blood Flows From the Wounds.

In the old days all nuns and monks in Mexico were compelled by the rigid rules of the order to use the discipline on their own naked persons every night and morning before retiring to and rising from the iron bedsteads that were purposely made too short and supplied only with a block of wood for a pillow. Mme. Calderon de la Barca, in her book on Mexico, written forty years ago, tells us all about it. Says she:

The discourse appeared like a prepation for the execution of a multitude of condemned criminals. After it they all joined in prayer with much fervor and enthusiasm, beating their breasts and falling upon their faces. Then a monk stood up, and in a very distinct voice read several passages of Scripture descriptive of Christ's sufferings. The organ then struck up the "Miserere," and all of a sudden the church was plunged into profound darkness. Suddenly a terrible voice cried out in the dark: "My brothers, when Jesus was fastened to the pillar by the Jews he was scourged!" At these words we heard the sounds of hundreds of scourges descending on the bare flesh. I can not conceive any thing more horrible. Before ten minutes had passed the sounds became splashing from blood that was flowing. We could not leave the church, but it was perfectly sickening, and had I not been able to hold Senora ——'s hand, and thus feel something human beside me in the darkness, I could have fancied myself transported into Dante's inferno. Now and then a suppressed groan was heard, and occasionally the voice of the monk encouraging them by ejaculations or by short passages from the Bible. Sometimes the organ struck up, and the poor wretches tried in faint voices to join in the "Miserere." The sound of the scourging was indescribable. At the end of half an hour a little bell was rung, and the voice of the monk was heard calling upon them to desist; but such was their enthusiasm that the horrible lashing continued louder and fiercer than ever. In vain he entreated them not to kill themselves, that heaven would be satisfied, and that human nature could not endure beyond a certain point. No answer but the loud sound of the scourges as their sharp iron points entered the flesh. At length, as if they were perfectly exhausted, the sound grew fainter, and little by little ceased altogether. We then got up in the dark, and with great difficulty groped our way through the galleries and down the stairs till we reached the door and had the pleasure of again feeling the fresh air. They tell us that the church floor is frequently covered with bood after one of these penances, and that a man died the other day in consequence of his wounds.

This awful penance was known as the desagravios, and it must be remembered that each man scourged only himself; if they had scourged each other the terrible energy displayed would seem less astonishing. The season of desagravios used to continue thirty-five days of every year. The women attended church in the morning, no men having been permitted to enter, and the men in the evening, when women were not admitted. The penance of the women was much less severe, and consisted chiefly in kneeling for half an hour, with arms extended in the form of a cross, a very painful position after the first five minutes.—*Fannie B. BENNIE AND NANNIE.

The First Ripple on the Smooth Surface of Their Young Love.

"Ben Harker, I don't care, you're just as mean as you can be."

"O, now, Nan, you're joking."

"No, I ain't, no such thing!"

"Yes, you are."

"I ain't! And if you think you can lead me around by the nose, you're very much mistaken."

"Pshaw, Nan, what have I——"

"I don't play second fiddle to no one, Mr. Ben Harker!"

"O, you don't?"

"No, I don't, and I'll let you know it! you think I care any thing for you? Pooh!"

"Of course you do."

"O, come, Nan, you know you think I'm sweet as sorghum."

"Now, you think that's smart!"

"Well, isn't it?"

"I'd ask if I was you? You think you're dreadful sharp anyhow."

"O, of course I do."

"Better look out or you might fall down and cut yourself—smarty!"

"O, say; let's kiss and make up."

"Yes, I think I see myself! Go and kiss your dear, sweet, beau-tee-ful, lovely, Viny Jackson if you want to kiss any body."

"O-o-o, so it's Viny that's put your nose out of joint."

"My nose out of joint! As if I cared the wrappings of my finger for Vine Jackson or you either, Ben Harker! You're no more to me, I can assure you, than the dirt under my feet!"

"Ain't hey?"

"No, you're not! Thought you could twist me around your little finger as you do her, eh?"

"Now, Nan, you know that I no more care for Vine than nothing, and——"

"Aw, no—of course not; tagging at her heels all the time like you was her very shadow itself!"

"Why, Nan, I——"

"You are, too! you are, you are, you are! I've been watching you!"

"I thought you didn't care."

"Care? I care? Pooh! it's nothing to me. Be her shadow if you're a mind to!"

"Well, what you kicking up such a row for, then? Come, Nan, you know I love you like all fury."

"Yes, you do!"

"I do, too."

"In a horn."

"No, sir, honest Injun!"

"Well, what you tag Vine so for, then?"

"O, just for—for—for—greens."

"You're dead in love with her."

"With Vine? O, your granny's nightcap! You must think I'm bad off for something to love."

"Well, you shan't come to see me ev'ry Sunday night and shine up to Vine Jackson all the rest of the week. Not much!"

"All right, Nan; now we're made up, hey?"

"I—I—I—guess so—what you doing?"

"Folks kiss when they make up, I guess. I s'pose that's the reason you got up this fuss."

"O-o-o—you—mean thing! Tee, hee, hee!"—Zenas Dane in Tid-Bits.

The Bell of Justice.

Here is a beautiful story which may or may not be true, but ought to be true, if only for the lesson it conveys. In Atri, one of the old cities of Italy, which you will not find on modern maps, so the story goes, the King caused a bell to be hung in a tower in one of the public squares, and called it the "Bell of Justice," and commanded that any one who had been wronged should ring the bell, and so call the magistrate of the city and ask and receive justice. When, in course of time, the lower end of the bell rope rotted away, a wild vine was tied to it to lengthen it; and, one day, an old and starving horse, that had been abandoned by its owner and turned out to die, wandered into the tower, and in trying to eat the vine, rang the bell. And the magistrate of the city, coming to see who had rung the bell, found this old and starving horse. And he caused the owner of the horse, in whose service he had toiled and been worn out, to be summoned before him, and decreed that as this poor horse had rung the Bell of Justice he should have justice, and that during the remainder of the horse's life his owner should provide for him proper food and drink and stable.—Golden Days.

Swedish Family Names.

Although there are many Swedes in this country but few Americans understand the old system of naming still used in Sweden. I often hear people ask how it is that the names of so many Swedes end in "soa." My mother's name was Eric Johnson and I was named Eric. In Sweden my name was Eric Ericson. When I came to this country I did as all Swedes do when they emigrate—took my father's name. This system of naming was never in vogue among the Normans or Saxons, and every person who is named Nelson or Johnson or Thompson or any other "son" may be sure that he is a descendant of the old Scandinavian freebooters.—Kansas City Times.

This affair was sent from Texas by a man who wants to supply the market with rattlesnake scarfs, and thinks the supply of Texas rattlesnakes is large enough to warrant the undertaking.

WIGS AND WIG-MAKERS.

Some Facts About the Art of Manipulating Human Hair.

A barber says that one of the few kinds of woman's work which is not overcrowded, and at which competent girls can always earn good wages, is that which includes the working, cutting and general management of the human hair. The hair trade is dull now. After the holidays people will have more time to attend to their hair. The average pay of female hairdressers is $8 a week. Sometimes it reaches as high as $18 per week, and sometimes goes down to $5. A girl who understands the business thoroughly can command $18 a week anywhere. One hairdresser in this city used to employ 140 girls, and paid out $700 weekly in wages.

The profit lies in false hair. Women that have their hair cut short and are tired of it, buy wigs or "switches" to wear in the street. Those whose hair is poor, or who suffer from baldness, wear false hair at all times. Girls who confine their attention to hair-working alone, earn from $8 to $10 a week. It is an art that needs skill and no small amount of patience and perseverance to succeed with. The hair with which the wigs are made is collected by commercial travelers in Germany and France. England and Belgium are poor markets for hair, not because of the scarcity, for both English and Belgian women have fine hair, but because they will not sell it. When collected it is put through a cleaning process, severe enough to fetch the dirt out of an elephant's hide, and then dyed several times over. The best hairdressers never buy hair from the head or from private hands.

Perfectly white hair is rare and commands almost any price. Natural curling is also of considerable value. A good wig of white hair costa $40. The material of which these wigs are made is clipped from the goat and seldom from the human head. A plenteously soft silky kind of snow-white hair comes from the Angora rabbit. A perfectly white and abundant wig of human hair would be worth at least $1,000. Hair cut from the head after death is never used by any good hairdresser. It can not be used to any advantage, as it will neither curl nor twist. Hair can be proved by pulling it to its utmost capacity. When loosened it will contract to its former length.—*N. Y. —Lime slacked with a solution of salt in water, and when properly thinned with skim milk, from which all the cream has been taken, makes a permanent whitewash for out-door work, and, it is said, renders the wood incombustible. It is an excellent wash for preserving shingles and for all farm purposes.

—Diversified farming means fields of grain, meadows and pasture; a kitchen garden and orchard; a lawn with trees and flowers, breeding mares and milch cows; sheep, swine and poultry. Live stock is the ground work, and will hold the soil fertile. Get that which is superior in all the departments. From the best is where the profit comes in.

—Flat-irons that show a disposition to rust may, while yet a trifle warm, be rubbed on edges and faces with tallow; when next put to heat they should, as soon as warm, have the tallow wiped off with an old cloth, when they will be found bright and smooth. At least that has been my experience, and they rusted so badly as sometimes to necessitate taking them to the grindstone to get them smooth. They were kept in different places, coated with beeswax, turpentine, coal oil, etc., but nothing answered until I chanced to try tallow.

THE WEIGHT OF HOGS.

Advantages of the So-Called Early Maturity System.

Any one who will visit the stock yards when large numbers of hogs are being received will notice a great difference in the size of those marketed now, compared with what were to be seen some years ago. Then the course followed quite generally was to keep on feeding hogs until they reached a weight of from 400 to 500 pounds, which necessitated keeping them through two winters. This manner of feeding for market was less profitable, to be sure, than that followed now, when comparatively few hogs weigh over 300 pounds, but it took farmers some time to fully comprehend how much better in every way it was to crowd the swine by full feeding from birth, so that they would reach 300 pounds weight when a year old. When they came to realize the advantages of the earlier maturing system, old-time methods were abandoned, and now very few hogs are kept till they reach 400 pounds. Those that weigh from 250 to 300 pounds sell as readily and at as good prices as those weighing more, and these weights may be made by the time the hog is 10 to 12 months old. This plan is in marked contrast to that followed before, when pigs were kept along on a light ration the first winter, and often had not made a weight of over 60 to 75 pounds when they were eight or ten months old. The farmer had not then calculated the cost of feeding as he has done since. His idea was simply to keep the pigs until they had reached a certain size, and then put them up to fatten. Often the expense of this was nearly or quite what it would have been to feed them in such a way as to reach a marketable size at about the same age. The question of feeding is better understood now among farmers than it was in those years. They now know that it takes less food to put a pound on a pig two months old than on one double that age, and less to put weight on a pig that weighs 100 pounds than on one that weighs 200 pounds. The younger the animal the less food it takes to make the same gain. Generally speaking the older the animal grows the more food must be given to add to its weight, and this continues to increase until maturity is reached. It is estimated that it takes from 30 to 40 per cent. more food to make a full ration the second year than it did the first, and at the same time the gain is only about two-thirds as much. Skillful feeding must be followed in order to grow the largest amount of meat at a given cost, and the sooner the pig has reached a marketable weight the better the profit. The more thoroughly the farmer studies the question of feeding the more successful he will be.—Boston Globe.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

Individuality the Lever Which Gives Character to an Age.

Individualism is a mysterious quality in a man's nature which distinguishes him from the masses. It is the genius of the man; the visible expression of his innermost self. Nature never casts two men in the same mold. The Omnipotent Mind, in His beneficent scheme of creation, designed that no two persons should be created exactly alike. When we study the genius of a people we discover that each family group is separate and distinct. Also, by a finer differentiation, we learn that in some inherent mental quality, or in the broader lines of physical organization, each member is unique. Whatever their relation to the world, then, we know that men and women differ in feature and form, in taste and feeling, in habit and experience, in physical power and intellectual endowment, in moral bias and mental bent, in temperment, in spirituality and environment. Human nature would have less interest for us were there less diversity in its individual expression, and were the identity of a people merged into one universal type. In every age, however, ideas prevail which revolutionize the world in its mode of living. In the procession of events radical changes occur in the externals of life. There is no stability in human affairs. The customs of to-day are the caricature of to-morrow. The intellectual ideal of an epoch is superseded by a feebler or more vigorous type. As history reveals, in some momentous crisis in human affairs the morals of a nation are fostered by the high example of its rulers and leaders; in the succeeding generation they are debauched by a lax of discipline, or the evils of a dissolute court. Society is constantly shifting its ground and seeking new outlets for its energies. Custom and prejudice are all-powerful, changing the character of a people and sapping its inner life. The tendency of the world is to conform mankind to one type. It prescribes a fixed diet, hours in which to dress and dine, and garments of one texture and cut. The length of the days marks the limit of waste. But whoever stand in awe of convention and yield to these influences are consumed by ennui. They huddle like sheep. They exchange their birthright for a mess of pottage, and forfeit their best possessions, as the inhabitants of a Spanish city deliver their door-keys to the night watchman and lock themselves out of their own domains. In pursuing these reflections, let us remember that as there is but one standard of duty, so there is but one way of living wisely and well. The soul creates its own conditions. It rises superior to its environment. It levels the walls of conventionalism as Joshua with a blast of the ram's horns overthrew the walls of Jericho. Society reflects the attitudes and raiment of a posturing, fickle-hearted, pleasure-seeking world. "A mind might ponder its thoughts for ages," says a wise philosopher, "and not gain as much self-knowledge as the passion of love shall teach it in a day." Carlyle said that the meaning of life is to unfold one's self. Within us are unexpected resources. Why spend our workdays over the stew-pan and our holidays in unpacking our trunks and airing old clothes? Because our neighbors across the way keep their blinds closed, should we exclude God's sunshine for fear of fading the parlor carpet? Each faculty and feeling has its use. A man has not learned what it is to live if he sees no horizon beyond the fence that incloses his farm. Would we be instructed? Would we learn how to live? Three books are ever at hand, the Bible, nature and soul. As the story goes, soldiers were held in such contempt during the civil wars in England that to snub them conferred a mark of distinction upon the citizens of coventry, while a woman was ostracised who ventured to ask one the time of day. Social proscription is daily visited upon erring mortals for a less heinous offense. The mandates of fashion are received by its votaries with silent submission, as the superstitious accept the decrees of fate. The surest way to improve society is a well-directed effort in the line of self-improvement. Individuality gives character to an age. The laws of society are never so sacred as the laws of one's being. "However mean your life is, meet and live it; do not shun it and call it bad names." "Love your life, poor as it is," These are words of wisdom. If the stock concern in which you have invested your savings fails to pay its dividends, make good its loss out of the overflowing bounty of nature and the generosity of the heart. What men say and think need not concern one who acts from single motives and is on the right track. Let him give up every thing but honor, and next to that his individuality, though the finger of ridicule is more dreaded than a thunderbolt. Stick to your path, if it is only a cowpath. Be yourself. Imitation is a puerile and cheap talent, an apish gift, an ignoble aim. The meanest possession is a truer measure of happiness than the egotistic self-complacency and pretension which boasts of costly equipages and long descent.—Harold Van Santwood, in Interior.

The Only Featherly.

"Are you the only Mr. Featherly in town?" inquired Bobby of that young gentleman, who was making an evening call.

"I think so, Bobby," was the response. "Why?"

"I heard ma tell Clara as you came up the steps that it was only Mr. Featherly."—N. Y. Sun.

Pleasant Winter Resorts.

The Windward Islands offer a series of charming resorts with excellent hotels at reasonable rates and fine society. Among the chief attractions of this beautiful chain is that one never grows tired from monotony—there is none. They are epitomes of Europe in small volumes. If one grows weary of England, a night's sail over tranquil seas will land him in France, another in Holland, then in Spain, and so on. Language, customs and cuisine change altogether and there is no chance for ennui. Cuba and Nassau are nearer at hand. In Havana Americans find as good hotels as in New York, at the same rates, a few hours of sea travel placing them in a city intensely foreign. Climate is excellent, but too warm for many, the mercury ranging among the eighties. At Nassau one finds almost every thing needed for comfort. A variety of hotels, good society, courteous natives and first class physicians combine to make this isle of June a most attractive resort.—American Magazine.

Let Your Light Shine.

In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred success is the stamp of merit. There may be enough seeming exceptions to prove the rule, but the proposition will stand. How is success attained? Variously. In business perhaps the essential of essentials is judicious, persistent advertising. Men who are "up to snuff" have grasped the idea. Many examples might be given. Probably none would better illustrate the truth of the above than R. W. Tansill, the cigar manufacturer of Chicago. Before he came into the field the opinion prevailed that cigars could be sold only by employing traveling-men. Mr. Tansill thought differently. He thought that an honest article, at a fair margin of profit, and liberally advertised in newspapers, could be sold direct to the retailer, thus saving to the dealer the large item of expense represented by the high-priced traveling-man. The plan worked from the start. Dealer and smoker "caught on" to such a surprising extent that, even at the small profit he reserves for himself, Mr. T. is now recognized as one of the solid men of Chicago. He has kept faith with his customers and with the public, and the name of his "Punch" cigar is a household word. Honesty, and originality, and pluck—AND ADVERTISING—did it.

MEN need not live high to be looked up to.

Wonderful Popularity.

The fact that the sale of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets exceeds that of any other pill in the market, be it great or small, is on account of the fact that they are tiny, little, sugar-coated granules, and that in most cases one little "Pellet" is sufficient for a dose; that they are purely vegetable and perfectly harmless; and for constipation, billousness, sick headache, and all diseases arising from derangement of the liver, stomach or bowels, they are absolutely a specific. A gentle laxative or active cathartic, according to size of dose.

A Madman at Large!

He is a well-known citizen, and his nearest and dearest friends do not suspect his insanity. How do we happen to know about it? Listen: his appetite is gone, he is low-spirited, he don't sleep well, he has night-sweats, he is annoyed by a hacking cough. These symptoms are the forerunners of consumption and death, and yet he neglects them. Is it any wonder that we call him a madman? If you are his friend tell him to get a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery without delay. It will cure him if he takes it in time. It will not miraculously create new lungs when the old ones are nearly gone, but it will restore diseased ones to a healthy condition. Tell him about it, and warn him that in his case delay means death.

Nervous Debility.

Sufferers from nervous debility complain of physical and nervous weakness and exhaustion; there is prostration of the physical strength, a tired feeling with no inclination for exertion, and the power to work is diminished; the patient wakes mornings tired and unrefreshed; there is an extreme nervous WEAKNESS AND NERVOUSNESS, dull, cloudy sensation, often accompanied by disagreeable feelings in the head and eyes; the thoughts wander easily; there will be gradual failing of strength, with weakness and pain in the back; bad taste in the mouth mornings; the vision becomes dim, the memory impaired, and there is frequent dizziness; the nerves become so weakened DEPRESSION OF MIND, that the least excitement or shock will flush the face, bring a tremor, trembling, or palpitation of the heart. There is often gloom and depression of the mind. For these symptoms Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic is a certain and positive cure. Under the use of this wonderful restorative, which is purely vegetable and therefore harmless, the dull eyes regain their brilliancy, the pale face and hollow cheeks show renewed health and vitality; the DIM VISION, weak and exhausted IMPAIRED MEMORY, feelings give place to strength and vigor, the brain becomes clear, the nerves strong and steady, the gloom and depression are lifted from the mind and perfect and permanent health is restored. It is an absolute specific for nervous debility. Young A WONDERFUL men with weakened nerves REMEDY, and exhausted vitality can regain their strength by its use. It restores lost energy and invigorates the weakened vital forces in old and young. No one need despair of a cure. PERFECT DIGESTION will be accomplished by taking Radway's Pills. By so doing SICK HEADACHE, Dyspepsia, Foul Stomach, Biliousness will be avoided and the food that is eaten contribute its nourishing properties for the support of the natural waste of the body.

DYSPEPSIA.

DR. RADWAY'S PILLS are a cure for this complaint. They restore strength to the stomach and enable it to perform its functions. The symptoms of Dyspepsia disappear, and with them the liability of the system to contract diseases. Take the medicine according to directions, and observe what we say in "False and True" respecting diet. A few extracts from the many letters we are constantly receiving:

Dr. A. C. Middlebrook, Doraville, Ga.: "I use them in my practice and family in preference to all other Pills."

Mrs. Caroline Monteith, Deer Creek, Ind.: "I believe my life has been saved by your medicine. Have long been suffering with Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint."

H. A. Carr, P. M., Escambia, Ala.: "Best Pills he has ever used."

E. Hummel, Boonville, Mo.: Cured him when all others failed.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-Joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

SATURDAY, FEB. 11, 1888.

We regret very much that we are compelled in mere self defence, as a citizen of Garrett county, to criticise the work of our law makers at Annapolis this winter. We are all citizens together, bound by a common cause, and the concerns of to-day are pregnant with results upon the future of our county. Laws of repression will re-act upon our posterity, and if we as citizens have, as we claim, the real prosperity of our county and state at heart, we will hesitate before we burden our statutes with such laws as are now on the calender at Annapolis, and which, in fact, are simply intended as repressive of the free rights of our citizens. The rights of the citizens of this State are already curtailed too much by the appointive power, and the correspondent in another column well voices the sentiment of the mass of our right thinking people when he, in a satirical vein, calls upon our masters to do away with elections altogether. It is hard to repress our feelings under the provocation, and that our people do not rise up in their might and power and give expression to their righteous indignation, is simply due to the fact that we are law abiding citizens and taught to respect the law making power. It looks as though we were to be punished for voting the Republican ticket and as though dire and severe punishment must be visited upon all those Democrats who last fall refused to submit to the lash of the masters. It is difficult for anyone outside the limits of our county to realize the true inwardness, as it were, of the many laws introduced the present session at Annapolis. Allow us to mention a few only as a sample:

A law providing for the appointment by the Governor of Election Commissioners for each county who shall have full control of our Election machinery, appointment of Registers, Judges, Clerks, &c.

A law providing for appointment of School Commissioners by the Governor—This to punish Dr. Bartlett, who last fall defied the ring, and to get rid of the present School Commissioners who are insisting upon the payment of a large balance due the school board by a late Democratic tax collector.

A law providing for the appointment of a county treasurer by the Governor, in order to make a place for a ring worker.

A law providing for the appointment by the Governor of nine men at five dollars a day to make a new assessment, which should be entitled a law to provide places for eleven Democrats (twelve counting the clerk) who worked for the ticket last fall,

A law to reduce the fees of the State's Attorney, who for the first time in the history of this Republican county happens to be a Republican.

A law to reduce the fees of the sheriff who is a Republican, and so on ad infinitum ad nauseum. Is it to be wondered at that property is depreciating in value, that our people are leaving the State, that capital is repulsed, taxes high, our roads bad, our school terms short and emmigrants passing through our doors by the hundreds every day? Gentlemen is it not high time that you call a halt. Our masters we humbly pray.

A Sober Second Thought.

It is a sober second thought which influenced the Senate of Maryland last night to request the return from the House of Delegates of the bill passed hurriedly last week extending the term of the mayor of Baltimore to four years. This bill was passed by the votes of nineteen Senators, and the return of the bill was requested by a vote of ten to nine. The House of Delegates was not in session last night, and so the request cannot be acted upon until it meets to-day. It may be assumed, of course, that the exercise of courtesy usual in such cases will bring the bill before the Senate again, when the opportunity will be afforded for more deliberate procedure than heretofore. Since the hasty action of the Senate in this matter it has been suggested that if the change of term and time is desirable it ought not to be accomplished until a new mayor and new members of both branches of the city council are elected on the proposed new basis. The people elected the present mayor for two years and the city councilmen for one and two years; it is considered undemocratic to legislate them into longer terms, when it is perfectly feasible to accomplish the object, which seems to be desired by many people, of doing away with the October elections by fixing the period for beginning the change when the terms of the present incumbents shall have expired. The objection which showed itself when the scheme was suddenly projected in the Legislature, without having been previously suggested in the campaign or intimated before the Legislature is significant of the way in which the step is regarded by the people, who are and ought to be jealous of their rights. It is to be hoped the Senate's action last night will result in such final action as will prevent the establishment of a precedent which may some time return to plague the inventors.—Baltimore Sun, Tuesday.

The Garrett delegation at Annapolis is respectfully requested to carefully read the above. They might give the last two clauses a second reading.

The following paragraphs from the Hagerstown Mail, a Democratic paper, are so fair and appropriate that we take pleasure in laying them before our readers:

In the very beginning of the session, several efforts were made to put upon the House of Delegates a superfluous number of employees. This has been persevered in untill finally the whole subject was referred to a committee of which Mr. Laird, of Montgomery, is chairman, and Mr. Smith, of this county, a member.

The committee gave full consideration to the matter and made a most satisfactory report.

This report shows that already, although the session is only four weeks old—and we can add with very little done—a large portion of time made up of adjournments—the number of officers provided for by the rules of the House and by the Act of Assembly, has been exceeded, and that the charges made for the session are largely in excess of that contemplated by the law; and that it is already apparent that a very considerable additional appropriation will be needed to meet the increased expenses. This is certainly a very discouraging beginning, for a session which convened under the most solemn promises of economy and retrenchment.

* * * * * *

The Committee on Elections have made a bad beginning toward the adoption of any measure to secure fair registration and fair elections.

At one of the meetings, in considering the bill drawn by Attorney General Whyte, it struck out the provision which gave to the County Commissioners of each county the appointment of the Registers and Judges of Election—they both constituting one set of officers—and in lieu of it constituting a commission of three for each county, to be appointed by the Governor, who are invested with the power to appoint all the registration and election officers.

This system would place in the hands of the Governor the whole election machinery of the State—a concentration of power unknown to any form of Democratic State government. The possession of such a power is in every way dangerous; true, Governor Jackson may exercise it with prudence and with fairness, but who may follow? The question is not that this or that individual may fairly exercise this great power, but whether any one, on general principles, should, under any circumstances, hold such a power.

Besides all this, the Governor, in exercising this great power, cannot be expected to know well enough the people in the counties to make fit selections, and therefore must depend upon local political characters who will more or less intrigue to get men acceptable to themselves appointed to these positions; whilst, on the other hand, the County Commissioners know generally the people of the county and can, in the discharge of their directed duties under the prepared bill, give more personal knowledge to the appointments, and hence less likely to be the appointment of mere local politicians.

It is something that in our judgment the counties will not stand, and ought not to stand, and that sooner than yield on so momentous a principle as this, they should not hesitate to reject any proposition containing it.

It is said that Governor Jackson, on general principles, objects to having the Legislature pass a mandatory act requiring county commissioners to do what they already have the power to do. He says that when in the Senate he consistently voted against all such mandatory bills because, in his opinion, the county commissioners are the best judges in the matter of county expenditures.

The people of Kansas are having such a trying time with the demoralized postal service under this Administration that Representative Perkins, of that state, wants Congress to inquire into it and find out where the trouble is. The postal service in many other sections of the country is in quite as bad condition as it can possibly be in Kansas, but it will be futile to expect Congress as at present composed to give it any attention.

Legislative Notes.

The following Garrett county bills have been approved by the Governor:

Reducing the fees of sheriff.

Repealing the act authorizing the appointment of warden to the jail.

Reducing the fees of County Surveyor.

Providing for additional pay to Court Crier. [This office is held by a Democrat.]

To repeal the act establishing District No. 12.

A bill requiring security for costs in trials before Justices of the Peace.

Amending the Deer Park charter.

Bill relating to jurors and witnesses. Providing for their payment by the County Treasurer, instead of by the Clerk.

Repealing the huckstering license so far as it applies to Garrett county.

Bills have been introduced by Mr. Friend to provide for repairs on the national road; to prohibit non-residents from fishing and hunting in Garrett county, and to prevent any one from fishing in Bear Creek for two years, also to prevent the destruction of fish in the waters of Garrett county by dynamite.

The following communication, no doubt intended for our contempoary across the way, by some means unknown to us reached our desk, and taken to be "copy," was set up before we discovered the mistake. Being upon the point of going to press we leave it for what it is worth, saying, however, that we assume no responsibility whatever for the motives expressed.

FOXTOWN, Feby. 6th, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:—Will you allow me through the columns of your valuable paper to make a few suggestions to our members of the General Assembly at Annapolis. You know, Mr. Editor, that it has got to be a trite aphorism that all things are possible with the Maryland Legislation, and you know just as well as I do, Mr. Editor, that the effete instrument called the Constitution of the State was never intended to curtail the privileges of our statesmen at Annapolis. Well now, for my idea, for which I claim no copy-right, or trade mark, it is not original either, unfortunately, as we have had the scheme mentioned heretofore. Pass a law doing away with these troublesome elections altogether, and give the Governor power to appoint everything, and if the Governor is not satisfied with this create a few more offices. Let us see. The Gov. is to appoint election commissioners. Well they must have clerks and I know a man about my size, weight and complexion that would just fill the bill for clerk, and there is Tom and Dick, and I was going to say Harry, who will soon be out of a job. There are some men down our way besides myself who have never held any fat office yet, and never will if the people have any say so, and as we voted the straight ticket and curse Dr. Bartlett and the school commissioners, why we believe we would get justice done us for once if Elections were done away with once and for all.

Now Mr. Editor I wish you would just see Tom at once and get him to prepare such a bill and get Dick to go down some day when it suits and push it through; and tell Cap. that if he is afraid of them Republicans who voted for him he can just "wink his eye" and they won't know any better.

Mr. Editor, I hope you will have the Postmaster-General stop the circulating of that Republican paper, taken by so many people down here. It just causes trouble and dissatisfaction, and every little thing that is done down at Annapolis must go all over the county. Please don't forget this.

Mr. Editor, please meet Dick at the train the first time he comes up to see the boys and tell him that I ran all over this part of the county and circulated local option stories about the Republicans last fall, and tell him he is my man for the head of the ticket in two years again. Tell him if he has promised everything else that, owing to the hard times, I will be satisfied with Return Judge.

Yours in haste,
OLD HICKORY.

P. S.—Don't forget to meet Dick at the train.

More than 700 Republican clubs have been organized in various parts of the country since the recent club convention in New York, and the good work is still going on. The seed was cast into genial soil; the crop is growing grandly; the harvest in November will be victory.

The real objection of the Democracy to the abolition of the internal revenue system is not that it would deprive the Government of any needful income, but that it would abolish a large number of offices which just now afford comfortable board and lodging for Democratic spoilsmen. The motto of the spoils party is, first and last: Better a surplus of public money that a deficiency of public offices.

Call a Halt at Once.

Garrett county, like Dorchester a couple of years ago, is to be dragooned, because a majority of her citizens voted the Republican ticket last fall. A bill has passed the House of Delegates to curtail the fees of Garrett officials, and another empowering the Governor to appoint her school commissioners, because a majority of the bench in that judicial district are Democrats, who dare to think for themselves, while still another measure is pending to place in the hands of the Governor the appointment of the county treasurer. Several years ago in Dorset the appointment of a county treasurer was in a board of commissioners, because a Democrat dared to defy the managers and secure a majority of the votes of the county for that office, and now, because a contumacious board of commissioners retains the same gentleman in office, the dragooning process is to be applied to undo the blundering work of the managers. How pitifully small and contemptible all of this is! No state in the Union, that has not for years been ground down under the heel of a political clique, would for a minute submit to such petty indignities. Do the people of Maryland propose to look on supinely while county after county is stripped of every vestage of self-government to satisfy the malice and rapacity of these political brigands? Is it not time that Maryland manhood was coming to the front to call a halt on this outrageous system of reprisals? Is every man's mouth in the state to be closed who differs with the Democratic managers concerning the sincerity of their intentions and the beneficence of their policy?—Baltimore American.

We Told You So.

The Democratic party in Maryland made certain pledges of reform to the people prior to the last election, just as it had done on the eve of every campaign since the nomination of Governor Hamilton. The American warned the public of its insincerity, and the utter improbability of good resulting from further support of an organization which had paved its pathway with broken promises. But the people of Maryland are good natured and long suffering. They did not believe that such earnest pleadings as were put forth by the dominant party could be made in bad faith, and the managers were given another trial. There is keen anxiety not only here in Baltimore, but all over the State, to learn what use will be made of the respite.

A partial and very unsatisfactory answer has already been given by the legislature. More than one-third of the session has been consumed by the passage of some five or six local bills, four of which were to suppress the right of self-government in Garrett county, because the majority of the people in that county voted for the Republican candidates last fall. The only other measure of importance which the legislature has thus far deigned to consider is one to deprive the people of Baltimore for two years of the right to choose their own mayor and city councilmen, because at the last election the voters frightened the managers out of their wits, and made them spend all the campaign funds on hand in order to elect their ticket. The party treasury is bankrupt and the managers are unwilling to face an indignant people or run the risk of a similar campaign until their coffers can be replenished. They openly state this as their motive for doubling the terms of Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, and the public is at liberty to judge, with such complacency as it may, what is to be expected from a session so auspiciously begun.

But, perhaps, when vengeance has been satiated and malice has done its worst, the majority will settle down to business of a character needed by the State. Well, the prospect is not reassuring. If there is anything a simon-pure Bourbon does hate, it is a fair election law, and through the ingenuity of the managers, the features of the admirable bills placed at the disposal of the members have been so mixed and played against each other that there is little likelihood of a measure being passed to correct the evils which have become almost unbearable in this city.

It wouldn't do, anyhow. The state must be saved to Cleveland if he should be the Democratic candidate for President, and he didn't get much of a majority in Maryland three years ago. The Republicans and Independents have become phenomenally active since then, and the complications caused by municipal politics are to be removed from the struggle. What is the use of clearing the way if a brand-new, honest registration and election law is to be interjected to dash Democratic hopes? This is cogent, if not honest, reasoning and will probably prevail.

Is there any chance for reform legislation on matters not directly connected with politics? Scarcely. A new assessment law may possibly be hurried through at the tail-end of the session, but all the other important interests will be made subservient to the efforts of the managers to deceive the people with regard to their intentions. It is necessary that an impression should go out to the state that a majority is anxious to pass an honest registration and election law, but is divided upon details. To make such an impression there must be a bitter sham battle over the provisions of the bill. This will consume so much valuable time that there will be no opportunity for the proper consideration of other important measures. This is not a forecast for a party to be proud of. Chickens generally come home to roost, and those who allowed their prejudices to get the better of their judgments last fall will probably have to chew the cud of disappointment without the sympathy which sometimes assuages sorrow. The American can only say, with regret, "We told you so."—Balto. American.

Democrats and Cleveland.

No real Democrat desires the re-election of Grover Cleveland. The evidences of the truth of this proposition are turning up every day. The reason is that Mr. Cleveland is an ingrate. He has done since his inauguration that has not appeared to him to be of advantage to himself. He was nominated and elected by Democrats. Of course, the Mugwumps helped. Every vote helps, especially in an election so closely contested as that of 1884. But where would Mr. Cleveland have been but for the Democrats? He would have received so few votes that all who cast them might have been drowned in Gen. Scott's "hasty plate of soup." If it were not for the Democrats he would have dever entered public life. His party gave him his first chance and made him President. A good many Democrats who knew him voted against him. These are now joined by a still larger number who have found him out since he has been in the White House. One of the latter has written to the Sun upbraiding our esteemed contemporary for abandoning its fight against Mr. Cleveland, and the Sun responds, in effect, that it has simply recognized and admitted certain recent Democratic acts which the President has committed. It refers especially to the fact that he has "kicked the civil service humbug overboard."

When Mr. Cleveland advocated Civil Service Reform he thought that it was a vote catcher. It was, perhaps, because it captured the Mugwumps, while most of the Democrats voted for him on the theory that the reform cry was a campaign dodge. But Cleveland was green at politics and proposed to keep his promise. Then the "boys" revolted, and the President discovered that he was about to be left stranded without the bulk of his party. If he had been sincere in his professions of love for the new system, this was the hour that he would have shown his courage, but he yielded and he is now one of the leading spoilsmen of his time. In consequence, true Democrats, like the Sun, think well of his recent conduct. Nevertheless they do not desire his renomination. The Sun says, in answer to its correspondent, that it does not admire him personally, and that it will not advocate his nomination. However, it will support him if he is nominated. The Democrats are all agreed on this point. They will take Mr. Cleveland if they are obliged to, but they do not like him. And they do not like him because it is apparent that he was a Civil Service Reformer and is now a spoilsman to advance his own interests. He was willing to turn his back upon the Democrats when he thought that the Mugwumps held the balance of power, and he is now ready to desert the Mugwumps when he finds that it is necessary for him to consider the Democrats. The man who thinks only of himself, and forgets his friends when he is prosperous, is an ingrate, and ingrates are not popular among Americans, whether they are Republicans or Democrats.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

Francis Miller, a prominent lawyer of Montgomery county, died at his home near Sandy Springs Thursday morning, aged 59 years. He was a prominent politician, and was twice a candidate on the Republican State ticket, being in 1887, nominated for Attorney-General. He leaves a widow and four children.

DIED IN CHURCH.—A sensation was occassioned in the Zane Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Wheeling, W. Va., Sunday evening by the discovery that one of the congregation, Mrs. Wm. Windel, who was supposed to be quietly listening to the service, was dead. She had expired from heart disease without attracting the slightest attention.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6th, 1888.—"Democratic impudence can go no farther" said a one armed veteran, "than it was carried by Senator Kenna in his alleged reply to Senator Sherman's recent speech on the President's message. Think of his daring to upbraid Sherman for having voted in July, 1864, for the passage of the law allowing immigration under contract. Does not the young Senator know why such a law became necessary? It was to offer special inducements to immigrants to come to the United States to take the place in our work shops and manufactories of the brave men who had gone to the front to subdue the rebellion against this Government that was originated and helped along by some of the very Democratic Senators who smiled their approval of the West Virginia Senator's impudent remarks on the flour of the Senate."

The point made by the old soldier is a good one. Senator Kenna's remarks were certainly impudent; but he could not possibly have been more severely punished than he was by the easy manner in which Senator Sherman demolished his whole argument by a few short sentences.

If the Democrats in Congress will only keep up the do-nothing policy that they have shown thus far, during the remainder of the session, the Republicans will have a walk over in the coming Presidential election and will elect two-thirds of the next House.

A new set of rules have just been adopted, with the sanction of Cleveland, by that monumental humbug, the Civil Service Commission. The following will do as a specimen of the cant and hypocrisy of this sham reform administration; it is the closing paragraph of the section providing for compulsory examination for promotion in the executive departments: "But persons in the classified service who were honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors, shall be exempt from such examinations."

That sounds good, don't it? Looks like the Union veteran was at last to be recognized by the Democratic administration? Not at all. It is only another case of make believe. This is put out as a lotion to soothe the wounds inflicted on the ex-soldiers and sailors by vetoing the pensions which they had earned in defense of their country. Nobody knows better than Cleveland and his Civil Service Commissioners that this rule will never help a single ex-soldier or soldier's widow to promotion as long as the chiefs of bureaux and divisions are allowed to certify which of the clerks shall be promoted, as they are now. The examinations are regarded among the clerks themselves as a farce, for no matter how high your percentage is, you may be sure you will never be certified for promotion unless you are "solid" with your chief. Oh no, Mr. Cleveland, you will have to get some better bait than this, before you will ever succeed in cathing any of the soldier votes. The boys have not, and are not likely to forget the "ghoulish glee" exhibited by you in some of your messages vetoing pensions for crippled soldiers.

The prospects of the Republicans for electing the President and a majority of the next House of Representatives, grow brighter every day. The Republicans all over the country are united and determined to go into this fight to win. The Democrats have fully demonstrated their incapacity to govern this country successfully, and it is truly amusing to hear their leaders arguing that because the country has not wholly gone to the dogs since Cleveland came in, they should be entrusted with another term of four years; they do not pretend to point out anything good that they have accomplished, but wish to claim credit and ask a continuance of public confidence because no very great evils have come upon us. If that is not "gall" then what should it be called? But of course no one is surprised at anything a Democrat may do.

The great Democratic fight in the dark is still on. The contestants are supposed to be Cleveland on one side and Hill and Randall on the other. It is a draw up to this present time.

HOWELL.

The Boston Herald wants to know how long it will take the bumptious protectionist organs to find out that "shouting Free Trade doesn't humbug anybody." It is most emphatically answered by a Southern newspaper, the Chattanooga Times, which wants to know how long it is going to take "the bumptious Reformers" to come out in their true colors as Free Traders, and adds that "it is about time the Free Traders found out that their reform cloak don't hide the architectural angles of their imported British political economy."

Bittinger.

Some people may think that the correspondent from Bittinger is dead or something very serious has befallen him. To this we would just say that he is still living, but is married, and therefore does not trouble himself about the local news of the county.

The prospects for Bittinger to make a large town some time in the near future is good. Four years ago there were no buildings of any description where the town now stands, and no person ever dreamed at that time that the time was so near at hand when they would see so many buildings where they now see them. We now have mail twice a week. Four years ago we were glad to get it once a month, The last six months two buildings were erected and three more are under construction. The present town consists of a store, a postoffice, a shoemaker shop, two blacksmith shops, a cooper shop, and a splendid prospect for a cheese factory by the first of May next, together with all these we have a splendid school with an enrollment of 69, and an average attendance of 44 4-23 last term. The town is surrounded by many very valuable sugar camps. We claim that for the chance Bittinger has had, there is no town in the county of the same age that will beat it. Not more than two miles from town is a steam saw and plaining mill.

There is considerable sickness in the neighborhood at present.

The citizens of this community have organized a debating society which is well regulated and largely attended every Wednesday evening.

Mr. Louis Durst favored us with a splendid song last Wednesday night, which seemed to please everybody. Come again Lou.

Mr. Samuel Brenneman has sold eleven thonsand bushels of coal this winter and has his miners still at work. He expects to raise the amount to nineteen thousand bushels yet.

We understand there is quite a lively time in Cherrytree Meadow settlement. The people are slaughtering their valuable hemlock timber and selling it to the paper mill.

Grantsville.

The blizzard must have frozen the correspondents of the REPUBLICAN, as none of them showed up last week.

Mr. Geo, Schramm and Miss Ida Smouse took a sleigh ride on Monday of last week, and on account of snow drifts came to a halt at Mr. John Bender's. The Rev. J. G. Bittinger was sent for and the two were made one. They returned to Geo. Stahl's where the boys, assisted by Geo. Miller, gave them an old-fashioned serenading.

Mr. John Merbach and Miss Sarah Durst were married some time ago, but managed to keep their secret until a few days ago, when a friend gave the secret away.

Harvey Miller has purchased the Christain Gingerick farm and Thos. J. Stanton the farm of Christian Vocht.

Our wide awake farmers have hauled immense piles of limestone and coal.

A protracted meeting is being held in the M. E. Church by Rev. H. E. Friend.

Emory Durst has invented a car coupler for which he expects to obtain a patent in the near future. Capitalists in Allegany county will advance the necessary funds. Emory says there is "millions in it."

Mr. Hiram B. Fuller, while out cutting saw logs some time ago, discovered in a tree lately cut down a large hollow filled with bees and honey. Forty pounds of honey for the family with enough left for the bees until next spring. We do not write to start everybody cutting saw logs, but as a fact.

Mrs. Nathan is seriously ill.

Mr. Wm. C. Cunningham has been sick for several months and confined to his bed for some time unable to walk.

Our ice houses are only partly filled, but we are not at all scared, the groundhog saw his shadow, you know. B.

The Grand Army Bill.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25.—Senator Davis, from the Pension Committee, to-day reported favorable a bill introduced by Senator Manderson, (and known as the Grand Army bill,) to pension ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated from manual labor, and provide pensions for dependent relatives of deceased soldiers. The bill has the same objects in view that were contemplated by what was known as the Dependent Pension bill, vetoed by the President during last Congress. It is believed, however, that the new bill, by the more explicit manner in which its purpose is stated, obviates the principal objections raised in the President's veto. The bill has the unanimous endorsement of the Pension Committee.

The first section of the bill declares that in considering the pension claims of dependent parents, the fact and cause of death, and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown, it shall be necessary only to show that the parent or parents are without other means of support than their own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for their support. A provision to this section fixes the time for the commencement of pension from the date of the passage of the act, or from the date of subsequent dependence, and declares that the pension shall continue no longer than the existence of such dependence.

In this respect it differs from the vetoed bill, which provided that no pension should commence prior to the passage of the act, and that, in case of application hereafter made, the pension should commence from the date of filing the application. By the second section of both bills, pensions at the rate of $12 per month are guaranteed all persons who served more than three months and were honorably discharged, and who are, or may hereafter be, suffering from mental or physical disability, not the results of their own vicious habits or their gross carelessness. They differ, however, in the language by which they define the degree of disability which shall entitle a person to pension. On this point the new bill reads: "Disability which totally incapacitates them for the performance of manuel labor;" while the lauguage of the vetoed bill read: "disability which incapacitated them for performance of labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, and who are dependent on their daily labor for support." The new bill also limits its provisions to those who served in the late rebellion, whereas the vetoed bill extended to soldiers of any war in which the United States was engaged. The bill further differs from the vetoed bill in the addition section granting pension to the widow, or minor children under eighteen years of age; or, in case there is no widow or minor children, to a dependent mother or father, without regard to the cause of death of the pensioner. The section also increases the pension af minor children from $2 to $5 per month, and declares that the pension of idiots or helpless minors shall continue during life, or the period of disability.

The section in relation to the fee of pension agents is amended by fixing a maximum fee of $10, instead of allowing a fee of $3, with a discretionary power in the Commissioner of pensions to increase the fee to $10, as the vetoed bill provided.

The remaining section, providing that no person shall be pensioned who is under political disabilities, or who incurred his disability while engaged in the military service against the United States, differs in no respect from the bill vetoed by President Cleveland.

Sherman's Reply to Kenna.

In the Senate Thursday Mr. Kenna, of West Virginia, spoke on the subject of the President's message on the surplus, revenue and tariff matters and of Mr. Sherman's speech in reply thereto.

Mr. Sherman in replying congratulated his friend from West Virginia on having proclaimed the fact that the ranks of the Democratic party were closed and that a distinct issue was to be presented to the people. That party had been in possession of power in the House of Representatives for more than ten years and not a single affirmative proposition or measure as to the tariff question had been presented to the judgment of the American people. If the Democratic party had (as Mr. Kenna declared) closed up its ranks, and if there was to be a fair and manly contest between the two parties on this great public question, he would be delighted, but he did not believe that this issue would be presented.

Let the Democratic ranks be closed, let the proposition to reduce taxation be presented and the Republican party would be found with its old ranks unbroken ready to accept the issue and let it go to the people. But for the Senator from West Virginia to assail him for having expressed views ten or twenty years ago, which appeared to be different from those he expressed to-day, was "rather a small hole to creep out of." It was true since the tariff discussions of thirty years ago he (Mr. Sherman) might have changed his mind; but if he had not done so, under the changed conditions and circumstances, he would not be worthy of a seat in the Senate. [Applause in the galleries.] It was on a bill to repeal the internal revenue taxes (in 1867) that he made the remark that the taxes most willingly paid were those on spirits, beer and tobacco.

So they were then. So they are to-dy. But, within the last few years complaint had come, mainly from the Southern States, against the tax on tobacco. It came from the farmers. He heedee it; he obeyed it; he regarded it. And in doing so he only did what the Senators from Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee and North Carolina ought to do. The Republican party said that it would not strike down any protected industry; that when manufactures had sprung up by the aid of protection, it would not strike them down, derange their conduct, derange their plans, lower the prices of their labor. The Republican party was with the Deocratic party in reducing such taxation as bore heavily on the people; but it would preserve the system of protection by tariff duties just as long as it was necessary to give to Americans a fair chance in the trade and commerce of the country—so as to not invite foreigners to compete with home industry.

The Senator from West Virginia had referred to a law in regard to immigration under contract. It was passed in the midst of the war, when 2,000,000 Northern men were down South. It was a law inviting foreigners to help to make good the absence of brave Union soldiers. He would have voted then for any kind of law to defeat the Democratic party of that day. But he was sure that he had voted for its repeal whenever that matter was presented. He congratulated Congress that the country was now to have a fair, square, manly issue presented on the industrial question—a question which affected the life, property and interests o every citizen—a question between protected labor in this country and the pauper labor of Europe—a question between diversified industries and that of a single (agricultural) interest, with a few blacksmiths' and carpenters' shops scattered throughout the country.

Amid the hum of applause which followed the close of Mr. Sherman's remarks, Mr. Regean rose, and briefly defended the Democratic party from the charge that it had presented no affirmative tariff proposition during the ten years that that party had a majority in the House.

The motion to refer the President's message then went over without action.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, tiright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is unquestionably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

THE Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright. It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.

with boards. Inside there is an air of comfort and cleanliness. A table stands in the center of the chief room, and along the wall a bench runs, which serves for chairs, of which there is usually a deficiency. From pots on the floor, ivy is sometimes trained upward to the roof, giving the room a festive and refreshing look. Not infrequently the worthy farmer is proud to have the dresses of his daughters hung in conspicuous positions, in order that swains who call may see the damsels are well provided with garments in case of a matrimonial alliance. The cow-houses are generally an improvement on those usually seen in England and Scotland. The building is larger and more space is allowed to each animal, while a clean wooden floor is ordinarily beneath the cattle. Little or no bedding is given. The level of the cow-house is, in most cases, raised high enough to allow a space beneath, into which the refuse is regularly swept through an opening in the floor.—Chambers' Journal.

OWNERSHIP.

Old Farmer Boggs, of Boggy Brook,
Went to the County Fair,
And with his wife, he strolled around
To see the wonders there.
"That horse," he said, "Grey Eagle Wing,
Will take the highest prize;
But our old Dobbin looks as well
And better to my eyes.
He is, I know, what folks call slow,
It's far the safest way to go;
Some men, perhaps, might think it strange,
I really should not like to change.

"And those fat oxen—Buck and Bright
Don't have so large a girth,
Nor match like them, just to a hair,
But I know what they're worth.
They're good to plow, and good to draw,
You stronger pullers never saw,
And always mind my 'gee, and haw,'
Some folks, perhaps, might think it strange,
I really shouldn't want to change."

"That Devon heifer cost, I heard,
A thousand dollars; now,"
Said Mrs. Boggs, "my Crumple Horn
Is just as good a cow;
Her milk, I'm sure, 's the very best,
Her butter is the yello west;
Some folks, perhaps, might think it strange,
I really shouldn't want to change.

"Those premium hogs"—said Mrs. Boggs,
"My little Cheshire pig
Is better than the best of them,
Although he's not so big.
And that young Jersey is not half
So pretty as old Brindle's calf;
Nor is there in the poultry pen,
As Speckled Wings so good a hen!"

As Farmer Boggs to Boggy Brook
Rode homeward from the Fair,
He said: "I wish my animals
Had all of them been there;
And if the judges had been wise
I might have taken every prize!"

THE LION.

At Times a Wonderful Coward, But Not Always.

I believe that every man who has been in the lion country will agree with me that he would rather meet a full-grown lion under almost any circumstances than an English bull dog. The lion is the king of beasts only now and then. Now and then he is the king of cowards. A bull dog is all determination. A lion schemes and calculates and takes no chances.

While assisting in the official survey of the northern portion of Cape Colony it was an almost every-day occurrence to sight a lion, and the adventures of our party were numerous, if not perilous. We got so that we feared the beasts only at night, or when we came upon them at their meals. Almost the first lion I saw in Africa proved himself an arrant coward. I was left to set a boundary stone between districts while the surveying party moved on. The hunters were out after fresh meat, the camp was two miles away, and I was working with my back to a patch of tall grass with a bush in the center of it. The entire party of us had stood there for a quarter of an hour without seeing or suspecting any danger, but a lion was all the while concealed in the patch. He kept quiet until the men were a mile away, and then crept forward for a spring at me. I heard a movement in my rear as I worked away, and whirling about I found myself face to face with a full-grown lion. He was crouched for a spring, and would have been upon me in another ten seconds.

I was terribly scared and had no time to collect my wits, but I did just the right thing after all. I jumped right at the brute with a loud yell, and he went bounding away like a bull. I followed him into the patch in my excitement, and he ran out in the open plain, dropping his tail like a cur and evidently badly rattled. I had a light spade in my hands, and as he dodged about to get back to cover I hit him a swinging blow over the rump. He yelled out like a dog hit with a stone, fell over, made a dash between my legs, and again got into the grass. I followed close upon his heels, yelling at the top of my voice, and what did the coward do but bolt for the open with his tail dragging in the grass. As he left cover I flung the spade and struck him in the side and staggered him. He growled and showed his yellow fangs, but there was no fight in him. When I jumped at him he ran away over the plain toward broken ground, and after chasing him for a quarter of a mile, I gave up and sat down. The men of the party came running up, amazed and astonished, and even though they had seen all that happened, they could scarcely credit their sight and senses. I knocked the courage all out of the beast by wheeling on him just at the right second. By upsetting his plan I made a coward of him. Had a bulldog meant to attack me, my turning on him would not have made the slightest difference.

Influenced the Senate of Maryland last night to request the return from the House of Delegates of the bill passed hurriedly last week extending the term of the mayor of Baltimore to four years. This bill was passed by the votes of nineteen Senators, and the return of the bill was requested by a vote of ten to nine. The House of Delegates was not in session last night, and so the request cannot be acted upon until it meets to-day. It may be assumed, of course, that the exercise of courtesy usual in such cases will bring the bill before the Senate again, when the opportunity will be afforded for more deliberate procedure than heretofore. Since the hasty action of the Senate in this matter it has been suggested that if the change of term and time is desirable it ought not to be accomp the claws of another lion or by the horn of a buffalo, and was just beginning to heal. The beast had all the advantage of me, and his running away could be laid to nothing but cowardice, but he was to redeem himself.

When we had gone into camp that evening there were fifty people of us, with four or five wagons, a score of horses, and from thirty to forty bullocks. We made quite a village; and a noisy one. Just while the supper fires were being replenished, and when everybody was moving about, this same lion came out of a thick piece of woods, roared loudly, and then walked straight at us. His roar aroused us, but no one supposed he would come nearer. The old fellow came forward at a dignified gait until he had traversed half the distance, and then, making half a dozen long bounds, he entered camp. No one was ready for him, and there was a great scattering. Some of us sprang for trees, and others dived into the tents; and such a row among horses and oxen you never heard. The old lion stood in a clear spot in the center of camp, and roared and growled and switched his tail about and bade us defiance, and before any one of us could make ready for a shot at him he sprang upon a cow, rolled her over, and then fastened his teeth into her neck and drew her out of camp, passing so close to one of the fires as to drag the hind legs of the cow over the coals. As soon as he was clear of the camp a dozen of us sprang out with our guns and fired at him by sound, and by great good luck two of the bullets hit him in the head and finished him. We had seen him drag the cow off as easily as a man could draw the body of a dog, and to make a comparison of strength we ordered four natives to take hold of the carcass. They could barely move it. It took seven of them to drag it back to the fires, and they had a hard tug at that.

The next adventure showed both the bravery and fierceness of the animal in one. I had been out alone with my rifle, and was on my way back to camp, and at about five o'clock in the evening skirted a sink or water hole on the edge of a dense wood. Suddenly a lion uttered a terrific roar, and I looked up to find a big fellow facing me. He had been creeping down the edge of the wood, perhaps routed out of his lair by some of our men, and while he was approaching the pool from one direction I was approaching from the other. He was not over three hundred feet away, and I knew at first glance that he was mad. His mane was up, his tail switching, and he meant fight. He could have been under cover at a jump, and thus avoided me altogether, and this would have been characteristic of a lion disturbed at that hour of the day. I brought my rifle down, aimed to hit him between the eyes, and pulled the trigger. The ball grazed his skull, knocking him down and making him crazy for a moment. I suspected from his antics that he was only touched, and knew that as soon as he had gathered himself he would come for me. He was whirling round and round and rolling over, and there was no show for a fair shot. I therefore made a bolt for the nearest tree, and I was just off the ground when the lion screamed out, and I dropped my gun to get above his reach.

It was a close call for me. The blood blinded him as he made his spring, and the paw which struck at me passed clear of my body. He went to the ground in a heap, rolled over two or three times, and before he was up I was out of reach. I got a seat about twenty-five feet from the ground, and the way that old fellow raged and raved for the next quarter of an hour was a circus to see. He had been in ill-temper before I raked his skull. He was now so mad that he would have faced a regiment of men. From the limb where I sat to the next, ten feet higher, the tree was smooth, and I did not dare attempt to climb it. I was just safe and no more. The enraged beast made all sorts of attempts to reach me, even trying to climb, but I was safe. Several times he ran back on the plain a few rods and then came for me Hail Columbia, springing up to within three or four feet of my perch but never coming high enough. His repeated failures angered him still further, and if a lion ever lost his head and got mad from nose to tail that fellow did. When he found he couldn't get me he made circles about the tree, rolled over and over, and his growls and roars were enough to set me in a chill.

I had my revolver, but it contained only three charges, and I had no more ammunition. I should have to reach his brain or heart to kill him, and he would not give me an opportunity for a steady shot. I soon saw that I was doomed to pass the night in the tree, and I then decided to save my bullets for some other danger which might be expected. The sun had hardly gone down when darkness came on. The lion gave up trying to reach me and sat up at the foot of the tree, and as the darkness grew deeper I could see his eyes blaze like coals. It was no use expecting any help from the camp, for no one would know which way to look for me, and after awhile I got a hitch around the tree with my scarf and took such 'precautions as would prevent me from falling off the limb should I go to sleep. That was a horrible night. At an early hour every species of wild beast and night bird was astir, and pandemonium reigned through the forest. Twice before midnight other lions approached the tree, to be driven off by the sentry, and a troop of elephants on their way to the pool passed within a hundred feet. About midnight the lion took on at a great rate, scratching up the leaves and switching his tail in defiance, and I heard fierce growling and snarling from some beast which turned out to be a panther, for I heard his claws raking the bark as he climbed a tree a few yards away. I knew what he was after, and I got my revolver ready and followed him by sound. He ascended to a height of about thirty-eight feet, came toward me on a limb, and I could see his eyes shining like diamonds.

The panther would have to spring about twenty feet to reach me. The lion knew what he was after, and he dashed to and fro under the tree and kept up such a roaring that all other beasts quit for the time in disgust. I was facing the panther as I sat on my perch. It seemed to me that I was doomed to be eaten by one or the other, and the only possible show I had was a shot at the panther. I could see nothing but his eyes, but I held my revolver as steady as possible and pulled the trigger. I think the beast was just ready to spring. I can not say that I hit him, but the flash and report would have confused him. I had hardly fired when he came for me, but fell short, and down he went to be seized by the enraged lion. That fight would have been worth going a good long way to see. It lasted fully fifteen minutes, and the fierce snarls and terrible roars kept me in a tremble. By and by both beasts seemed to have had enough, and the conflict ceased. I heard the lion walking about and whining and moaning, but after a few minutes these sounds ceased, and I was not further disturbed during the night. When daylight came I saw the panther dead at the foot of the tree, and just at the edge of the pool was the dead body of the lion. He had gone there to drink, and had tumbled over just as he turned from the water.

I examined both bodies carefully before I left. Such work with teeth and claws few men ever saw. The lion had seized each foreleg of the panther and crushed the bones of the ankle in his teeth. He had torn his neck in a horrible manner, and had bitten the flesh of one of his cheeks until a pull would have exposed the jaw-bone on that side. The panther had bitten the lion about the throat and breast, but had depended more on his claws. With these he had literally disemboweled the king.

Fifty miles to the south of where this adventure happened one of our men was one morning pushing his way through the high grass along the left bank of a dry creek when a lioness, lion and two half-grown cubs sprang up before him. There was no time to retreat, and he was too dumbfounded to cry out. The lions stood and stared for a few seconds, evidently more frightened than the man, and then went off with a rush. That day, as we sat in the shade of a great tree eating our lunch, we were suddenly saluted with a roar of defiance. Our tree stood in the open, nearly a quarter of a mile from the forest, and there were twenty-two of us around the fire. It was high noon, with a bright sun, and yet a lion came out of the woods and directly toward us, roaring as he came and evidently full of fight. The native called out that it was one of those he had seen in the grass, and for a time none of us moved. However, it soon became evident that the old fellow meant mischief, and we seized guns and spears. He held straight for the crowd, roaring and growling, and the instant the first shot was fired he increased his gait to a rush. He was among us in a few seconds, and for a couple of minutes there was wild excitement. Two or three men were knocked down, two bitten, one struck by a bullet intended for the lion, and the beast was finally killed by the thrust of a spear.—N. Y. Sun.

BAD PAPER MONEY.

The Most Reliable Way of Detecting a Counterfeit Bill.

A bank cashier tells that the best way to tell a counterfeit bill is by sound and feeling. "Take the bill firmly between the thumb and index-finger of your left hand and pull it quickly through your fingers like this. Now listen to the sound it makes. It is not just like rubbing silk, and neither does it resemble a paper sound closely. It's a noise that is too peculiar to admit of a description."

"Do they make counterfeit paper so near like the original that you can't tell the difference?"

"You can't tell by looking at it. It is only by the sound and touch. Now listen to the sound made by this counterfeit twenty dollar bill. You see, that's a slick noise, something like pulling glazed or oiled paper through the fingers. A child could tell the difference between that bill and a genuine one. But look at it and you will think your eye is on something that would pass muster for twenty dollars worth of groceries."

"Who taught you this business?"

"O, my first lesson was given by an old man who has been all over this country and Europe teaching the business. He has in his possession over a thousand specimens of counterfeits. He obtained them from the authorities of the different Governments. He has no peer in the business, and every expert in the country owes his knowledge to this old man."—Kansas City Star.

—In every country there is some special drawback to the sheep industry. Here we have dogs and wolves. In Australia rabbits eat nearly all the grass and leave the pastures as bare as Old Mother Hubbard's cupboard. In New Zealand the great enemy of sheep is a large green parrot. It lights on a sheep and devours its living flesh. After it has eaten its fill it flies away. But, as a rule, the wounds it makes never heal.

CAUSES OF NEURALGIA.

Some Pertinent Remarks Upon a Very Painful Subject.

"Pain is the cry of a nerve for pure blood," is the striking explanation of neuralgia given by the most original nerve pathologist of the present century. Although we can only become sensible of pain through our nerves, all pain is not neuralgia. This term is applied to a special kind of pain, often occurring without any ascertainable local cause, but frequently referable to certain morbid conditions, the removal of which will remove the pain likewise.

The nervous system has been aptly compared to a telegraph circuit. The brain is the central office, from and to which the wires—the nerves—lead. The nerves, which conduct sensations from the various termini to the brain are sensitive nerves, those which convey impressions from the brain to the periphery are nerves of motion. It is the first class or sensitive nerves that are affected in neuralgia.

Pressure, inflamation or injury of the nerves may cause neuralgia. Certain poisons circulating in the blood, such as the malarial, rheumatic, or gouty poison, may also cause it. In other cases it is due to simply poverty of the blood; these are often extremely difficult to relieve, and in many such cases good teeth have been sacrificed under the belief that the neuralgia was due to a decayed molar.

Any sensitive nerve in the body may be the seat of neuralgia. Thus it may occur in the scalp, the face, the chest, abdominal organs, the thighs, or even the feet. The neuralgias of the face and head and of the thighs are most frequent. The first is very liable to be a manifestation of malaria, cold or defective teeth, while sciatica or neuralgia of the great sensitive nerve of the thigh and leg is often an expression of the rheumatic poison.

A very singular form of neuralgia is that affecting the nerves of amputated limbs. It not rarely happens that after an amputated stump has healed the nerves of the stump being compressed in the scar, become exceedingly painful. Curiously the pain is not felt in the stump, but in the extremity of the limb which has been amputated. In one coming under the notice of the writer a man whose arm had been amputated above the elbow referred the exquisite pain he felt to the little finger of the amputated hand years after the operation. An old one-legged soldier applying for an increase of pension said: "He had more pain in the foot which ain't, than in the foot which are." This was a terse way of saying that he continued to have a pain in the foot which he had lost on the battle-field many years before.

The explanation of this consists in the fact that the terminal filaments of a nerve are its most sensitive points; they are the "feelers," the points from which the sensations start on their course to the brain, where they give notice that something is wrong with its outlying districts. When the nerve is injured in its continuity the sensation is often referred to the terminal ends. Every one who has struck his "crazy bone—the point above the elbow where the ulnar nerve is very superficial and easily injured—must have noticed how much the sensation was affected in the little finger, the pain being often greater there than at the point where the blow was struck.

The treatment of neuralgia must be guided by its causes. If a carious tooth is at the end of the painful nerve, it should be extracted in order to remove the source of irritation. If the neuralgia is rheumatic in origin, the treatment must be directed to the removal of that cause. Many sufferers find that the habitual wearing of flannel undergarments will obviate the attacks of their old enemy to which they were subject at every change of the weather. In cases of sciatica swathing the limb in flannel dipped in hot water or in spirits of turpentine will often cut short an attack.

When the nerve pain is due to malarial poison or to general depravement of the blood, the most brilliant effects are secured from the proper use of quinine, iron and arsenic. In old chronic cases due to inflammation in or along the track of the nerve, the persistent use of electricity will often effect a cure. The proper use of such a potent remedy requires, however, a thorough study of the different currents employed, as it is easy to see that harm may be done by its injudicious employment. In very obstinate cases, especially of sciatica, the nerve has been exposed by the surgeon, picked up out of its bed and stretched with considerable force. In many cases this procedure has been completely effectual. In others, a piece of the nerve has been excised so as to cut off the transmission of painful sensations from the seat of disease or injury to the brain. This has also sometimes resulted in cure.

When all is done, however, some cases will resist the utmost efforts of doctor and patient combined. The latter can often, by watching the efforts of deleterious influences, learn to avoid them, and thus render the visits of the physician unnecessary.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

TEMPERANCE READING.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

A Little Speech for a Little Boy.

Perhaps you think a little boy
Can hardly understand
The message that the Temperance folks
Would send through all the land.

But this I know, that want and woe
In drunkards' homes are found;
And places where they buy their drinks
Are open all around.

For liquor, and tobacco, too,
More money goes, they say,
Than all the people in the land
For bread and meat now pay.

Some think a little does no harm,
It makes them feel so nice;
But ah! it is more dangerous
Than skating on thin ice.

A little makes you soon want more;
And more and more you crave;
At last, to alcoholic drinks
You find yourself a slave.

The chain begins to bind your soul
When first you take a drop;
Before you take a single drink,
That is the time to stop!

WHAT KINDNESS DID.

The Change It Accomplished, That Made It Seem Like Heaven Upon Earth.

Leighton says: "Good words do more than hard speeches, as the sunbeams without any noise will make the traveler cast off his cloak, which all the blustering winds could not do, but only make him bind it closer to him."

Shakespeare wrote: "Use every man [and that of course means every woman and child as well] after his desert, and who shall say 'scape whipping?" And yet we often hear boys and girls say of some of their acquaintances who are suffering: "Let them go. Who cares? They've only got what they deserve." Well, it may be so, "they have got what they deserve," but still they need your kindness.

Little Harry Woodruff had been brought up by a wise and gentle mother. She had taught him that no day passes without some opportunity being offered of service to the Master by doing some little kindness to His children. He—poor little soul!—was in great need of kindness, but very little, except from the patient, loving, busy mother, came to his share.

Arthur Benton, a boy Harry's own age, treated him with plenty of the opposite quality—cruelty.

Perhaps some of you have read about Sylla commanding the bones of Marius to be broken, his eyes to be pulled out, his hands to be cut off, and his body to be torn in pieces; and you have thought with indignation: "What horrible cruelty!" Yes, it was horrible cruelty; but alas! there are cruel Syllas among boys and girls, and Arthur Benton was one of them. He would rend the sad heart of Harry by hurling at him, whenever he saw him, cruel remarks, such as: "How's Daddy Red-nose? Where's mammy's red apron? I can always see the string;" and

"Hark! hark! hear the dogs bark,
The beggars are coming to town;
Some in rags, and some in tags,
But never, oh never! a velvet gown.

Poor little Harry knew nothing about the broken bones of Marius, but he felt that his own heart must be broken, it ached so at Arthur's unfeeling taunts.

His drunken father's red nose. Was it necessary for Arthur to fling it in his face? Did he not see it even when away from it, in his mind's eye? Was it not a great blot upon his child-life? And his "mammy's red apron," as Arthur called it, was it not right for him to put it on to help his mother rub the clothes she "took in?" "Poor tired mother—" his lips quivered.

And the "apron string" that Arthur averred he saw—well, well, if Arthur was so mean as to call his devotion to the dear mother who had no one but him to cling to, "tied to an apron string" he could do so; he would be tied to her as long as she should live; he wanted to be. As for "some in rags," etc., well, he supposed those were the drunkards' children, and he was a drunkard's child; not from choice, and—"Oh, it is so hard!" he wailed to himself.

One winter day Harry carried a package of clean clothes to a lady living a mile from his home. He skated on the creek most of the way, although on account of the mild weather he was obliged to pick his way, thus avoiding unsafe spots. When nearly home he met Arthur Benton, who lashed his sensitive soul as usual, calling out, as he imitated a drunken man's swaying:

"Daddy Red-nose
Can't manage his poor toes;
Poor Daddy Red-nose—"

"You'd better shut up," he said, his face flushing, his eyes flashing; "and, Arthur Benton, seein' you can't swim you might manage your own toes; there's a thin place over there."

The advice was not heeded, Arthur going recklessly on as Harry sped homeward with this parting shot ringing in his ears: "Hurry, Apron Strings, mammy wants you." But above their ringing there came a scream of terror, and Harry wheeled suddenly about, his face white with horror. There was a hole in the ice, and Arthur had disappeared. Thoughts rushed swiftly through his brain. "Arthur is his mother's only son. I must save him; but oh, why don't he come up? How the ice crackles under my feet!"

It was the work of but a moment to take off his thin corduroy—the "ragtag" of the drowning boy's bantering—and fling himself down upon the ice. Crawling carefully on hands and knees towards the hole in the ice, he uttered a swift but silent prayer: "Oh, God, save him—he isn't fit to die."

It was with a transport of joy that the noble little fellow saw Arthur's head rise through the opening. The face was white, and wan and scared, but its expression changed as a cheery voice called: "Don't, for pity's sake, sink again! Catch my coat, Arthur! Hang on tight, I'll save you yet!" And save him he did, although with great difficulty.

It was an exceedingly humble and shivering little boy that Harry half-led, half-carried home to Mrs. Benton. That night, when the rescued child was tucked up in his warm bed, his kind mother sitting beside him, the latter was startled by a burst of sobs, and a low, remorseful cry: "Oh, mother!"

"What is it, Arthur dear?" Mrs. Benton asked, tenderly. "Does your back pain you so much?"

"Oh, mother! I've been the meanest boy under the sun. Harry ought to have let me drown;" and then, with bitter tears, he told the tale of his cruel persecutions. Mrs. Benton listened with sorrow and joy—sorrow because of her boy's past unkindness, and joy on account of his penitence.

The next morning Harry's father was sober, and under reaction from drink, was thoughtful and somewhat inclined to self-reproach.

Then there came a rap at the door, and a message was delivered. Harry's face brightened as he read the boyish note of Arthur's.

"Oh, mother!" Harry said, "he's asked me to forgive him, and he's awfully sorry he ever called me names; and he says his mother says you are one of the best women that ever lived (an' you are), an' that he's glad I'm your protector, considerin' father—" Harry had forgotten his father was within hearing, and he flushed guiltily and stopped talking when he became conscious of it.

"'Considering father' what?" demanded Mr. Woodruff.

"Never mind—father—I didn't think—I forgot—I—" stammered Harry.

"Out with it this instant! what did that boy say?"

There was no help for it; it must come: "Since you had—forgotten—to—protect—her," he said, trembling.

"Forgotten to protect! Forgotten—to protect! O, God! help me to remember, even now—even now." The poor man fell upon his knees in an agony of remorse. Then, after his importunate pleading, light came, and peace such as no pen can portray.

Days passed, prayer was heard instead of cursing, and a look of joy was in Mrs. Woodruff's eyes as she said to Harry: "It seems like Heaven upon earth to see this change in father."—Ernest Gilmore.

A WIFE'S TEARS.

Josh Spillit's New Drink, and How He Came to Adopt It.

"Boys, I won't drink without you take what I do," said old Josh Spillit, in reply to an invitation. He was a toper of long standing and an abundant capacity, and the boys looked at him in astonishment.

"The idea," one of them replied, "that you should prescribe conditions is laughable. Perhaps you want to force one of those abominable mixtures on us. You are chief of mixed drinks, and I won't agree to your condition."

"He wants to run us on castor-oil and brandy," said the judge, who would willingly have taken the oil to get the brandy.

"No, I'm squar," replied old Spillit. "Take my drink, I'm with you."

The boys agreed and stood along the bar. Every one turned to Spillit, and regarded him with interest.

"Mr. Bartender," said Spillit, "give me a glass of water."

"What, water!" the boys exclaimed.

"Yes, water. It's a new drink to me, I admit, and I expect it's a scarce article. Lemme tell you how I came to take it. Several days ago, as a passel of us went fishing, we took a fine chance of whisky along, an' had a heap of fun. Long toward even' I got powerful drunk, an' crawled under a tree and went to sleep. The boys drank up all the whisky an' came back to town. They thought it a good joke 'cause they'd left me out there drunk, and told it around town with a mighty bluster. My son got hold of the report and told it at home. Well, I laid under the tree all night, and when I woke in the morning there sot my wife right thar by me. She didn't say a word when I woke up; she sorter turned her head away. She still didn't say nothin', but I could see that she was chokin'.

"'I wish I had suthing to drink,' says I.

"Then she tuck a cup which she fotch with her, an' went down to whar a spring biled up, an' dipped up a cupful an' fotch it to me. Jess as she was handin' it to me she leaned over to hide her eyes, an' I seed a tear drop in the water. I took the cup and drunk the water and the tear, an' raisin' my hands, I vowed that I would never drink my wife's tears again; that I had been drinking them for the last twenty years, and that I was going to stop. You boys know who it was left me drunk. You were all in the gang.

FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

TWO VALENTINES.

Mary to Papa.

Bert and Nell and Caroline
Sit a-choosing valentines,
Laugh and whisper, nod and wink—
Got a secret, s'pose they think.
Call me baby! Sakes alive!
They forget I'm almost five.
Guess I know whom I love best
Well as Bert and all the rest.
Here's a pencil on the shelf,
Now I'll write one all myself.

"This is from your little May;
There—it says as plain as day,
Loves you more than tongue can tell
(That's what Charlie wrote for Nell)—
Loves you all the day and night,
All the dark and all the bright—
More than candy, pink and nice
Frosted cake, or choc'late mice.
Now I know your eyes will shine
'Cause you're choosed my Valentine."

Papa to Mary.

Here's to my little maid,
Whom I love well;
All her sweet, winsome ways
I can not tell;

New graces she puts on
Each day and hour,
She grows within my heart—
My precious flower!

Here's to my little maid,
Who loves me well;
All my fond thoughts for her
No tongue can tell.

I am her sweetheart true,
And she is mine;
She is the girl I choose
My Valentine.

GENERAL GEORGE.

The Valentine He Did Not, and the One He Did, Receive.

We fellows always called him General George, and so did the girls. His name was George Washington. There was a Smith tacked on to it, but that was so short and so at the end, like a bob on a kite, that folks 'most always forgot it.

He belonged to Miss Melissa Melon. She got him out of the county house, and he did chores for her and was company, seeing she lived alone two miles down the road from the "Corners." It was a pretty good walk on a cold winter morning, for the roads were generally drifted down that way, but I tell you that made no difference to General George. Rain or shine, he was always the first at the school-house. He swept out, you know, and made the fire, and so on, and he was always at his post.

Jane Graham, one of the girls that has traveled around considerable, and seen a big statue of the first George Washington, says that there was a few lines on the bottom of the marble, and they said: "First in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." "Our General," she said, "was first in piece (his clothes were awfully patched, you see), first in war (he could fight like blazes when he was a mind to), and first in the school-house in the morning!"

Well, he was the funniest-looking creature you ever saw! My, how we did laugh the first day he came! Tall, awful tall, and as thin as a rail, with a big head and a shock of black hair. Celesty Moore said he looked for all the world like her big shawl-pin! And when Miss Root asked his name, he drew himself up on his long legs and stood up straight and stiff as a poker, and says in a loud voice, like as he was going to speak a piece, "George Washington—" here Bill Greene, who sat behind, pinched him, and he jumped and turned red, and never said the Smith at all, and there's no knowing whether Miss Root ever put it down."

Well, the General wa'n't much in his studies when he first came. Teacher put him in the "First Reader," with Billy Dwight and Jerry Gray and all those shavers. But my stars! It wa'n't two terms before that 'ere chap had skipped up into the highest classes, and was figuring out "Partial Payments" and parsing "Paradise Lost" with the biggest scholars! He was at it all the while, too. Dig! dig! dig! Didn't care a copper for recess. P'raps, though, he didn't have much fun out on the play-ground—we fellows run him so much, and the girls were always poking fun, too.

But le's see; I started out to tell you about his valentine, didn't I? It happened the morning of February fourteenth. School hadn't begun yet. Rob Haliday, Charlie Forbes, and one or two other fellows, were over by the girls' seats. Myrtie Talbot had a lot of valentines on her desk. Some had been sent her, and others she was going to send to folks.

Most of them were real pretty—all lace-paper, pink roses, hearts and darts, and little angels playing with bows and arrows—but there were a few funny ones. There was one gamey old chap, with a cocked hat, long-tailed coat, and a pair of top-boots. He looked as though he'd just got up to make a speech.

"Oh, my eye!" says Rob, "that's General George, sure enough!"

"You ought to send it to him, says Clara Gordon.

"Do!" we all joined in. "It would be a splendid joke!"

"How can I send it to him so he'll get it to-day?" says Myrtie.

"Put it in his dinner basket," said Clara.

"Yes, and now's your time to do it," says Rob, "for he's gone down to the pump."

We all rushed pell-mell across the room to General George's seat. Rob grabbed up the basket. It was a ragged old one, the cover tied on by a string.

"Now, we'll see what the General's got to eat!" says Rob. "He's a selfish pig, any way! Now, you know, when any of us boys bring something nice we share it. We just have a jolly picnic in the recitation-room."

"But the General don't, says I. "He never comes with us, but mopes out here alone, and even tips up the lid of his desk so we can't see what he's got!"

"I know it!" says Rob; and he gave a sniff as he yanked off the string. Then he pulled up the cover and peeked in. Then he looked at us, and says he: "By the Great Horn Spoon!"

We always knew when Rob said that he was considerably surprised.

The rest of us crowded around peeked in, too, and what do you s'pose the General had?

Nice white bread and butter with a bit of cold chicken or ham, a piece of apple-pie, a lump of cheese and a chunk of fruit-cake?

He had—just one small piece of rye-bread and a raw turnip!

That was all! No butter even on the bread!

Myrtie stepped back, and her face was all red and her eyes kinder shiny and misty. She grabbed the valentine from Clara's hand and tore it into forty-'leven bits before you could say "Jack Robinson."

"General George'll never have this valentine!" she said.

"Why don't that mean old maid feed him better?" says Rob, angry-like.

"I s'pose she can't afford it," says Myrtie. "She's awful poor. But she's good to the General—that is, he seems to like her. I s'pose she gives him as good as she has herself."

"But rye-bread and a turnip!" says Rob, groaning. "It seems to me something ought to be done about it."

"Course there ought," says Myrtie. "This thing's got to be seen to. We've acted real mean to the General, teasing the very life out of him! It's a shame! Poor fellow! With no father or mother! How could we have carried on so! And he's smart enough at his books to make us all blush for ourselves. I'm going to speak to my papa this very night and coax him to do something for the boy. But I'll tell you what we'll do now: we'll give the General a valentine—only it won't be the kind we were going to! Let's all take something from our baskets and fill his!"

"All right!" says we all.

So Myrtie put in a big piece of cocoa-nut-cake and a roast chicken's drum-stick; Rob gave an apple turnover and a pop-corn ball; Clara gave some pickles and gingerbread, and the others bread and butter, and so on, until the basket was so full that the cover bulged up.

Then Myrtie wrote on a slip of paper and tied it on the handle, and these are the words she wrote:

"A valentine from those who are awfully sorry they've plagued you so, but who promise to never do so again."

You can bet the General was pleased when he found it! His big black eyes just shone! And since then he's joined in our games with the best of us. He's turned out to be an awfully jolly chap, and we're dreadful proud of him on examination and exhibition days.—Mary E. Brush, in Youth's Companion.

Toddlekins' Boo'fer Kitten.

THE KITTEN'S STORY.

I am Toddlekins' Boo'fer kitten. I used to live in a barrel with my brothers and sisters. But now I am Toddlekins' Boo'fer Kitten.

This is how I belong to Toddlekins. One day my mother boxed my ears. Toddlekins heard me cry. She climbed up the side of the barrel to peep in. The next minute Toddlekins was in too, standing on her head with her feet in the air! I don't believe you ever heard such a noise as me and Toddlekins and the rest of us made then, all crying together!

"That's what comes of being a little peep-girl!" said the nurse. The nurse then took hold of Toddlekins' feet and pulled her out, and Toddlekins, as she went out, grabbed me by the neck and pulled me out too. We looked at each other. "Boo'fer Kitten, I love you!" said Toddlekins. "Miaow!" said I. And I have been Toddlekin's Boo'fer Kitten ever since.—Babyland.

How Arab Boys Play Marbles.

The Arabs play marbles differently from the American boys. Of course the arrangement of the marbles to be shot at can be varied in many ways; but the young Arabs shoot the marble in a way of their own and much more accurately than American lads. The left hand is laid flat on the ground with the fingers closed together, and the marble is placed in the groove between the middle finger and forefinger. The forefinger of the right hand is then pressed firmly on the end joint of the middle finger, and when the middle finger is suddenly pushed aside, the forefinger of the right hand slips out with more or less force and projects the marble very accurately in the direction of the groove on the left hand. Many of the boys become very expert.

Perhaps marbles are almost the only playthings for which Arab childre pay money, and as a rule only a very small capital is needed.—Henry W. Jessup, in St. Nicholas.

He can read any chapter in the Bible, but not a word in any other book or newspaper.

—A bill has been reported in the United States Senate which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to take Indian children, between the ages of eight and eighteen, belonging to tribes receiving annuities, and place them in schools on reservations. Power is given the Secretary to withhold annuities from Indians refusing to allow their children to attend the schools. Another bill, in relation to marriage between Indian women and white men, provides that by such marriages the white men shall not acquire any interest in tribal property to which the Indian woman is entitled. The marriage is also declared to have the effect of conferring citizenship on the women.

THE FIRST RAZOR.

Early Historical References to the Custom of Shaving the Face.

The earliest reference to shaving is found in Genesis xii., 14, where we read that Joseph, on being summoned before the King, shaved himself. There are several directions as to shaving in Leviticus, and the practice is alluded to in many other parts of Scripture. Egypt is the only country mentioned in the Bible where shaving was practiced. In all other countries such an act would have been ignominious. Herodotus mentions that the Egyptians allowed their beards to grow when in mourning. So particular were they as to shaving at other times that to have neglected it was a subject of reproach and ridicule, and whenever they intended to convey the idea of a man of low condition and slovenly habits the artists represented him with a beard. Unlike the Romans of a later age, the Egyptians did not confine the privilege of shaving to free citizens, but obliged their slaves to shave both beard and head. The priests also shaved the head. Shaving the head became customary among the Romans about 300 B. C. According to Pliny, Scipio Africanus was the first Roman who shaved daily. In France the custom of shaving arose when Louis XIII. came to the throne young and beardless. The Anglo-Saxons wore their beards until, at the conquest, they were compelled to follow the example of the Normans who shaved. From the time of Edward III. to Charles I. beards were universally worn. In Charles II.'s reign the mustache and whiskers only were worn, and soon after this the practice of shaving became general throughout Europe. The revival of the custom of wearing the beard dates from the time of the Crimea, 1854-55.—All the Year Round.

CHURCH STATISTICS.

The Number of Evangelical Christians in the United States.

The following statistics are from advanced sheets of the forthcoming "History of Christianity in the United States," by Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D. D., who has compiled them, as far as possible, from the minutes of 1887. They represent the year 1886, save in a few instances, where they are from the official books of 1886, 1885 or 1884. Occasionally the year books say "congregations," but in nearly all cases the figures represent organized churches.

THE ARGONAUT DAYS.

A Forty-Niner's Reminiscences of Early Days in California.

Colonel Mike Brannigan, the celebrated guide and backman of El Paso, Tex., relates the following reminiscences of early days in San Francisco:

"I have come back to San Francisco for the purpose of seeing some of my old friends of the Argonaut days of 1849, that is, as many of them as are alive. I can tell you some interesting things about early times in this city. I owned and drove the first hack that ever rumbled over the streets of San Francisco. In 1851 I got $50 a night to drive Catherine Hayes, the famous singer, and her mother, between the Razette House and Tom Maguire's Theater, which was then situated on Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny. I also got the same sum from several others at the same time for the same trip. Those were good old days, and I, as well, I suppose, as very many others, would wish to see them back again. I saw $1,200 paid for a box in Maguire's Theater on the opening night of Catherine Hayes' season. A Limerick butcher at Sacramento paid $1,300 for a box when she went to the capital city to sing. Dollars in those days were more plentiful than nickels are now. When the mail steamers would arrive I have seen a gambler give a man an ounce of dust—that is, $16—for his place in the long line of anxious people waiting their turn outside the old post-office, which was then at the corner of Brenham place and Clay street. Then you would have to pay $12 a dozen for articles to be laundried, and men used to throw soiled underclothing away and buy new articles rather than pay for washing. I remember when Lotta Crabtree first appeared in this city. She used to play a banjo and dance jigs at Gilbert's Melodeon, at the corner of Kearny and Clay streets, and got $6 a week. I think that was in 1854 or 1855. She went to Virginia City in 1860 and made a hit. Twenty-dollar gold pieces were showered on the stage for her benefit. My charges then as a hack-driver were $50 a day and all expenses paid. I would like to see that state of things again, and we would have less complaints about capitalists and the like. Every body was a capitalist in the old days, and if only a few of the wealthiest exist now I don't know why they ought to be blamed. We all had a chance to become millionaires, and if we did not why it can't be helped, and there is no use in repining."—San Francisco Examiner.

INDIAN TIGREROS.

How They Spear Pumas and Jaguars in Costa Rica Forests.

A couple of spears, one long and one shorter, made the equipment of the tigrero. Their dogs were big, slouching, light-colored animals, were evidently related related to the coyote. Dangerous rather than savage, not prone to bark, they perform the role of house dogs badly. The Don assured us that puppies will not bark at all unless taught by others. But they learn at once, thus differing from the thoroughbred coyote, which can only howl and whimper in the first generation of domesticity, and seldom succeeds in learning a true bark until the third.

We asked why one dollar was granted for a slain puma, and but fifty cents for a jaguar, seeing that the latter animal is so much more dangerous and destructive. It appears that, in the fashion of hunting to which these Indians obstinately adhere, the less terrible beast causes the greater loss of life. Tigreros go in couples, the head man in advance with his two spears, the subordinate following with his machete or chopping-knife. The jaguar is easily tracked, and does not go far when roused. So soon as it is thoroughly conveyed to his mind that these intruders wish to see him personally he turns with a roar that always gives sufficient warning to such practiced shikaris. A moment afterward he comes trotting up. The foremost Indian kneels, holding a spear in either hand, the long one fartherest out—his companion stands at the side. The jaguar does not pause, but gathering himself up, cleaves the air in a mighty bound, his fore legs wide asunder and claws hooked to rend. Very seldom does it happen that the long spears fails to transfix his unprotected chest, or the shorter one his throat.

Such is not the puma's conduct. When disturbed he skulks swiftly through the brushwood, and commonly escapes. In following a jaguar dogs are seldom hurt, for he disregards them, and they have no need to press him. But the puma turns constantly, massacres a hound, and speeds on again. Even if wounded he is slow to stand; but when brought to bay at length it is a more deadly risk to face him. For this combat the spears are useless. Springing with his paws crossed, the puma would dash them aside. His feet firmly planted, knife in his left hand, machete in his right, the Indian stands forward. He has one blow, in midair. If it fails—if the skull be not cleft like an apple—brute and man roll over in hideous embrace. At such a time the comrade seldom wanted in jaguar hunting would be invaluable. But when an Indian sets out intentionally to track a puma he goes alone. So did his fathers and so does he.

Very, very rarely a jaguar springs with his paws crossed, and then there is wailing in the tigrero's hut. For the spears upon which he relied are twisted from his grasp, and the huge beast falls upon him kneeling. If the compadre with the machete be true the tiger has probably two victims instead of one. The single chance of these poor Indians lies with their dogs, and it is but a very small one. Jaguars with this uncomfortable habit are scarce, however—if it be more than an accident. None of the ranchero's Indians had seen a case, though that fact proves little. Witnesses of the phenomenon rarely survive.—Belgravia.

A LINCOLN STORY.

Reminiscences of a Lady's Visit to the President During the War.

As too much can not be said about Mr. Lincoln I am induced to send you the following account of an interview which the writer had with him.

I called upon him to ask for a position in the service for my son. Alas! I received it, my boy went to the war and never returned. I was accompanied by a lady companion, a Southern woman, and we had with us a little boy, a grandson of Lord Fairfax. After a pleasant interview, my friend said: "Will you give me your autograph for a friend in England?" I, however, had hesitated to ask him, although wanting one very much. He went to his desk and wrote, "Yours truly, A. Lincoln," but instead of giving it to my friend, who had asked for it, he handed it to me, and I still have it among my treasures. He then wrote simply, "A. Lincoln." Handing it to my friend he remarked, sotto voce: "That is good enough for England."

I then said: "Mr. President, I have brought a grandson of Lord Fairfax to see you." He was a beautiful boy and Mr. Lincoln, who was always fond of children, extended his hand to him, saying: "He bids fair to be a handsomer man than I am. Well! my little man, you are for the Union?" The boy looked up into Mr. Lincoln's face and replied: "Somewhat!" Both I and my friend were horrified; she, a Southern woman, fearing we would be arrested, and I, that I would fail in getting my boy's appointment, but Mr. Lincoln only laughed and said: "I guess there are a good many somewhats."

Just as we were about to withdraw, wishing to express my thanks for his courtesy, I said: "O, Mr. Lincoln, you do not know how much I shall prize your autograph, and if you only get us out of this war it will be ever very precious." I shall never forget his earnest; careworn, yet hopeful expression of countenance as he replied: "You pray for me and I will do the best I can."

After getting into our carriage I said to the boy, who was only about seven years of age: "Why did you say you were somewhat for the Union?" He replied: "Why, mamma is always crying and praying for the South and papa is serving Uncle Sam, and I can not help being somewhat."—Cor. N. Y. Graphic

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—A German physician has traced ninety-two distinct diseases in women to the use of the corset.

—Men and monkeys are the only animals possessing eyelashes on both eyelids; other animals have them only on the lower lid, or else have none on either.

—A commission of the Paris Academy of Medicines finds that hydrofluoric acid, which is highly antiseptic, has a therapeutis action when inhaled. It dissents, however, from the opinion of glass-workers that the inhalations cure consumption, but considers that they may be useful in diphtheria.

—According to statistics compiled there, there was an increase of fifty per cent. in the number of cattle killed in Kansas City last year; twenty per per cent. of sheep, and ten per cent. of hogs. The value of cattle handled there is placed at $50,000,000. The amount of oleomargarine manufactured there reached 3,000,000 pounds.

—The power possessed by flowing water for transporting or moving stones or gravel over which it runs is greatly augmented by the speed of its flow; this power increases as the sixth power of the velocity, so that a stream flowing six times faster than another will be able to transport 46,656 times more matter.

—Wood employed for building which is not exposed to heat or moisture is not likely to suffer from the ravages of insects; but, if it is placed so that no draughts of fresh air can reach it, to prevent accumulation of products of decomposition, decay soon sets in, and the decaying albuminous substances, acting upon the fiber, causes it to lose its tenacity and become a friable mass.

—It still seems to be an unsettled question whether wood can be ignited by the heat of a steam pipe in contact with it. It is admitted, theoretically, that it is impossible for wood to take fire at a temperature of 212 degrees, or somewhat higher; but it is well known that there have been a large number of cases of fire reported as occurring from this cause, and the evidence is very conflicting.

—An East Indian scientific journal says that fibers of bamboo, China, grass and pineapple, after proper treatment, can be spun so fine that an expert could hardly distinguish the product from silk. Large quantities of cloth woven from China grass and bamboo are brought into the Rangoon markets by Chinamen and Bhamo, and although the material is not manufactured by modern looms, the quality is so fine as to resemble tussore silk.

—The total number of coke ovens in the United States up to the time when last noted was 22,597; building, 4,154. The production of coke for 1886 was 6,845,369 tons, costing at oven $1.63 per ton. Six years ago there were only 14,119 ovens, and the cost at ovens was then $1.88 per ton. Pennsylvania has produced seventy-nine per dent. of all the coke made in the United States. The consumption of coal for 1886 was 10,688,972 tons. New coke works are still being projected.

—The new industry in the South, which has been noted, develops another use for pine needles, besides that of spreading an aromatic odor from the filling of a pillow. One product of these needles is a remarkably strong oil, claimed to possess valuable medicinal properties; another is pine wool, which is bleached, dyed, and woven, this wool being a fleecy brown mass, possessing a pleasant odor, which gives it value as a moth destroyer when employed in the form of carpet lining; and to these is to be added another product made from this wool, viz., a strong, cheap matting, adapted for halls, stairways and offices.

COMFORTABLE HOMES.

Interior Arrangements of a Norwegian Farm House.

The first impression of an ordinary Norwegian farm house, is not very favorable. A cluster of houses, small and aged, crowd around a large dwelling house, which generally looks somewhat dilapidated. But this appearance is deceptive; for the walls being of wood, they look old in a few years, and become blotched and seared by the weather. The roof is of the same material, or in the case of the principal building, either of red tile or slab. Sometimes the dwelling-house is painted white, when the effect is to relieve the sober aspects of the groups. The walls are usually stout and thoroughly waterproof, plank about four inches thick being used in their construction. These planks are placed edgewise on one another, crossed and countersunk at the angles and calked in the seams with dry moss. A skin of thin wood is placed over the outside, while the interior is lined smoothly with boards. Inside there is an air of comfort and cleanliness. A table stands in the center of the chief room, and along the wall a bench runs, which serves for chairs, of which there is usually a deficiency. From pots on the floor, ivy is sometimes trained upward to the roof, giving the room a festive and refreshing look. Not infrequently the worthy farmer is proud to have the dresses of his daughters hung in conspicuous positions, in order that swains who call may see the damsels are well provided with garments in case of a matrimonial alliance. The cow-houses are generally an improvement on those usually seen in England and Scotland. The building is larger and more space is allowed to each animal, while a clean wooden floor is ordinarily beneath the cattle. Little or no bedding is given. The level of the cow-house is, in most cases, raised high enough to allow a space beneath, into which the refuse is regularly swept through an opening in the floor.—Chambers' Journal.

The Third Party.

PORTLAND, ME., Feb. 2.—Neal Dow, one of the leaders of the Prohibition party, in an interview with a correspondent of the New York World, talked about the third party and its influence in politics in the coming campaign.

"What do you think of the attitude of the Republican leaders towards prohibition in this State," was asked.

"I know," replied the General, "that the liquor dealers of the West sent notice to the Republican bosses in Maine three or four years ago that any injury inflicted upon the liquor traffic in the State would be revenged by them upon the Republican party in Ohio, Michigan, Illinois and Minnesota, and that is the only way we can account for the failure of the Republicans to do anything here to materially cripple the grogshops."

"Do you think the Republican party in Maine is in accord with the policy of the late Governor Bodwell in his war on the liquor dealers?"

"One of the Republican leaders said to me: 'This crusade is all fireworks; it amounts to nothing.' Governor Bodwell, however, did his duty, whether the leaders approved of it or not. There is no doubt but what his policy was upheld by a large majority of the Republicans of Maine."

"What do you think will be the future treatment of the temperance question by the Republicans of Maine?"

"I don't think Governor Bodwell's policy will be carried out by Mr. Marble, or any one likely to succeed him, and the reason is, that Mr. Bodwell did not want to be Governor, nor did he desire a renomination, so he was at liberty to act conscientiously in the discharge of his duty. But his successor, whatever he may be, will be an office-seeker and depend upon the bosses for nomination and election, and he will be controlled by them, as their policy in Maine, as in every other State throughout the Union, is to protect the liquor traffic. The Republican party everywhere is as thoroughly committed to the liquor interest as the Democratic. Cleveland's message seems to me to have given a chance for success to the Republican party, for it affords them an opportunity to agree that protection of home industry will really be an issue in the Presidential campaign, and in that way mislead a great many temperance men."

"What will be the strength of the Prohibition vote in the country at the next election?"

"It will be much increased, as our numbers have been increasing very rapidly."

"What is the prospect of the Republicans in New York?"

"I don't believe they can carry it. The Prohibition vote will surely increase there and I believe we shall poll 50,000 votes."

"Where will the prohibitionists put in their work?"

"They will concentrate their efforts in New York, for they believe their labors will be most effective. They will also do something in Ohio."

"Shall you take the stump?"

"I have been engaged to speak in Western New York in August, and shall also appear on the stump in the western portion of that State. I shall also make several speeches in Maine."

"Who will be your Presidential standard bearer?"

"General Fiske, of New Jersey, undoubtedly. He seems to be the most available man. I do not believe he would accept the candidacy, however, but from a sense of duty."

"What do you propose to do in this State?"

"We have decided to place a full ticket in the field in Maine. Undoubtedly our vote would have been greatly diminished had Governor Bodwell lived and been re-nominated, but the conditions are changed now."

"Do you regard the approaching campaign as an important one?"

"Yes, extremely so for the Republican party. It is life or death with it. If it loses there will be a dissolution of the party, and a new organization will be formed with a prohibition plank in its platform."

"What particular argument will the prohibition speakers press?"

"We shall lay great emphasis upon the collusion of the Republican party with the liquor traffic and endeavor to draw the attention of voters to this in all parts of the country."

"What have you to say in regard to Mr. Blaine?" was the last query.

"Mr. Blaine is personally a temperance man and a Prohibitionist, I voted for him in 1884, thinking that if he were elected the Republican would recover the confidence and respect of the country. I shall not vote for him in the coming election. It is no longer a question of candidates, for the reason that prohibition cannot win in the lifetime of the Republican party."

Rays of Mirth.

It is a wise provision of nature that a man can neither kick himself nor pat his own back.

"What kind of boys go to heaven?" asked a Sunday School superintendent. "Dead boys," yelled the youngest member of the infant class.

"Grandpa, dear, we have come to wish you many happy returns of your birthday, and mamma says if you give us each a dollar we are not to lose it on our way home."

A physician having directed one of his patients to bathe a wound in tepid water, the patient sent his little girl to the drug store with a note saying: "Please sell bearer one-half pint of tepid water."

"So the missus is to be married, eh?" said the gardner to the cook. "Yis; and in illigant stoyle, too. She's goin' for to have a dhress thray yarruds long, and four pall-bearers ter kerry it."

Pedestrian: "Madam, a boy who I am told is your son has just thrown a stone at me, causing a wound that is very painful. What are you going to do about it?" Mother: "I don't know; have you tried arnica?"—Tid-Bits.

A gentleman once asked the celebrated Dr. Abernathy if he thought the moderate use of snuff would injure the brain. "No, sir," was Abernathy's reply, "for no man with a single ounce of brain would ever think of taking snuff."

A zealous preacher, who loved smoking as well as he ought, in a heated discourse exclaimed, aiming his rifle at some of his hearers: "Brethren, there is no sleeping car on the train to glory." One of the party whom he aimed to hit responded: "No, brother, nor smoking car either."

Old lady (to grocer's boy): "Don't you know, boy, that it is very rude to whistle when dealing with a lady?" Boy: "That's what the boss told me to do, mum." Old lady: "Told you to whistle?" Boy: "Yes'm. He said if we ever sold you anything we'd have to whistle for the money."—Harper's Bazar.

The grandmma of two little boys was once obliged to reprove the younger brother. "My dear," said she solemnly, "if you tell lies, God will not love you, and when you die, your soul will not go to heaven."

"What ith my theul?" inquired Johnny, pleasantly.

"Your soul?" grandmma was overheard to exclaim, "your soul, my child, is—I am surprised that a child of your age does not know what his soul is. It is—is it possible that you do not know? Well, then—ahem! Pick up grandmma's specs, Johnny. There, now, you may run out and play, my dear."

Baby's First Shoes.

The first baby when she needs her first pair of shoes hears this from her proud and happy father:

"And does it want some little shoes-ums for its 'ittle feet-ums? Well, papa shall get all the 'ittle shoes-ums it wants, so he shall."

When the order for the second pair comes he seems a little surprised, and says:

"What! Has papa's little girl worn out its pretty new shoes so soon? She is a little rogue, so she is, to kick out her shoes so."

Before the child is a month older her toes are to be seen through her third pair of shoes.

"What!" cries papa, when he is informed of the fact. "Well, I'd just like to know how in thunderation that youngster kicks out her shoes so fast. She wears out more shoes than I do. She'd break up a bank president at this rate,"

And when the order for the fifth pair comes, papa observes:

"Well, if this don't beat the Jews! I'd like to know if I've got to get that young one a new pair of shoes every day of her life. I'm tired to death of this thing, Clara. If she wants another pair of shoes this month she can take the pennies out of her bank and buy 'em. I won't. Poor papa!—Texas Siftings.

One of the best arguments in defense of the present protective system is that of Senator Edmunds, in the February number of Harper's. It proves conclusively that the duties paid under the tariff are not a tax on the consumer, but have to be paid by the foreign manufacturer and producer, and that the non-producer in the United States is called upon to pay only a small portion, if any, of this sum. He also describes the successive steps by which England was transformed from a protective country to a comparatively free trade empire.

A note up in a rural postoffice reads: "Dear —: The reason I didn't laff when you laft at me in the postoffice yesterday was because I hed a bile on my fase and kant laff. If I laff she'll bust. But I love you, bile or no bile, laff or no laff."

No Joke on Her.

A woman came down town the other day with a "yearling" in a baby carriage, and when she reached a certain dry goods store she left the cab at the door and went in to trade. The youngster was good natured over being left alone, and one of the clerks who knew the mother well thought to play a joke on her. While she was busy trading he slipped out and wheeled the carriage into an adjoining store. A rush of customers prevented him from seeing the woman as she went out. She stood at the door for a moment, as if wondering if she had forgotten something, and then started off and went straight home.

By that time "bub" had become uneasy and was raising a row, and they sent in for the clerk to come and get him. The mother having gone home, he was obliged to follow her with cart and baby, the latter howling at the top of his voice and attracting general attention. The clerk had reached the gate when the woman came, and as she saw the baby and cart she threw up both hands and exclaimed:

"Dear me, but I thought it was a spool of twist I had forgotten!"

Mr. Montgomery has been going wrong of late. He has got into the habit of staying out late at night.

"Fergy, dear," began his wife when he came home to dinner the other evening, "Christmas will soon be here." "Remarkable!" ejaculated Ferguson. "Do you know what I want!" she continued, without heeding the scornful remark, "The earth, with a shawl strap to carry it, probably." "No, Fergy; all I want is one of those beautiful little watches." "A watch! What in the thunder do you want a watch for?" "So that I won't become angry with you, Fergy," said Mrs. Montgomery, as she wound her arms tenderly about his neck. "Every night for a week I've heard the clock strike 2 before you came home. I know the clock can't be right, and I want the gong removed. If I have a watch we won't need the gong." Mr. Montgomery did not wait for Christmas. He bought the watch the next day.

Dan Rice, the veteran showman, was nicely fooled one day, as he was engaged announcing the wonders of his circus outside the tent. A man standing with a little boy in the crowd near by cried out: "I'll bet you a dollar you cannot let me see a lion." "Done!" said the showman, eagerly; "put down your money." The man placed a dollar in the hand of a bystander and Dan did the same. "Now walk this way," said the showman, "and I'll soon convince you. There you are," said he triumphantly; "look in that corner at the beautiful Numidian lion." "I don't see any," responded the man. "What's the matter with you?" asked the showman. "I'm blind," was the grinning reply, and in a few minutes the man pocketed the two dollars and went away.

Old Mr. Bentley—I hear that the Cadwalladers pay a thousand a year for their pew in the Church of the Holy St. Swell.

Old Mrs. Bentley—Goodness; they must be very religious folks.

Guest (calling down through the speaking tube) — "Quick? What shall I do? There's a man under my bed!" Night Clerk—"Sleep on top of the bed."

A. S. ABELL & CO., PUBLISHERS,
BALTIMORE.

A. S. ABELL. GEORGE W. ABELL.
EDWIN F. ABELL. WALTER R. ABELL.

The BALTIMORE WEEKLY SUN continues to preserve its position, maintained for many years, as a model Family Newspaper, During the past year, in order to accommodate the great variety of matter seeking admission to its columns, it has been found necessary to issue a Supplement almost every weak, presenting a home newspaper unequaled for freshness and variety. Its literary features are selected with discriminating taste and with special reference to the entertainment and instruction of the family circle. Its Agricultural and Veterinary Departments, edited by specialists, have been of great value to the Farmer, while its Fashion Articles, Household Recipes, etc., have continued to be a source of weekly interest and intruction to ladies. The latest news up to the hours of publication is given in its correspondence and telegraphic dispatches, while its editorials, besides discussing current events in an impartial spirit, afford much wholesome advice and suggestion on social, economic and other topics. The proceedings of Congress, the Maryland and other Legislatures, the National Political Conventions, and the Presidential and Congressional elections are among the important features that will be promptly and copiously presented in its columns during 1888.

A Great National Journal.

THE NEW YORK
Mail and Express

The Advocate of the Best Interests of the Home—The Enemy of the Saloon. The Friend of American Labor. The Favorite Newspaper of People of Refined Tastes Everywhere.

For many years the daily edition of the New York MAIL AND EXPRESS has been recognized as the leading afternoon paper of the metropolis, while its weekly edition has been THE FAVORITE HOME PAPER in thousands of families in every State in the Union. It has attained its great popularity and influence by its enterprise in the collection of news, the purity of its tone, and the ability and courage of its advocacy of the Right on all questions of public interest.

FOR 1888 the MAIL AND EXPRESS will be a better paper than ever, and, as a clean, interesting, instructive

Home Newspaper,

it solicits comparison with any other in the country. It is one of the LARGEST PAPERS PUBLISHED anywhere, and spares neither labor nor expense to secure for its readers the very best in all departments of newspaper literature.

OUR POLITICS.

We believe the Republican party to be the true instrument of the POLITICAL PROGRESS of the American people; and holding that the honest enforcement of its principles is the best guarantee of the national welfare, we shall support them with all our might; but we shall always treat opposing parties with consideration and fair play.

AGAINST THE SALOON.

The MAIL AND EXPRESS is the recognized leading journal of the country in the great Anti-Saloon Republican movement. It believes that the liquor traffic as it exists to-day in the United States is the enemy of society, a fruitful source of corruption in politics, the ally of anarchy, a school of crime, and, with its avowed purpose of seeking to corruptly control elections and legislation, is a menace to the public welfare and deserves the condemnation of all good men.

In brief, all who wish to have in their homes a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER of national scope, broad views, clean pages and courageous, yet kindly, utterances on all questions of general public interest, will not be disappointed in the MAIL AND EXPRESS, and we respectfully solicit their influence and support.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—WEEKLY, per year, $1.00; six months, 60 cents; three months, 30 cents. DAILY, per year, $6.00; six months, $3.00; three months, $1.50; one month, 50 cents.

PREMIUMS.

EVERY SUBSCRIBER to the WEEKLY who sends ten cents to pay for packing and postage receives as a present from the MAIL AND EXPRESS ANY TWO of our elegant Premium Portraits of Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Logan and Beecher, exact copies of the finest crayon likenesses, 21x27 inches in size, sent to his address free and postpaid.

FOR $1.50 we send the MAIL AND EXPRESS one year and a copy of Munkacsy's great painting of Christ Before Pilate, richly and artistically reproduced in 20 colors. The original of this great painting was recently sold for over $100,000.

A LARGE LIST of other popular and valuable premiums are offered to subscribers and agents on the most liberal terms. They cannot be described here. Send for our circular.

AGENTS WANTED.

We want a good agent in every town and village where we have not one now at work. Send for our Special Circular to Agents and see our liberal offers.

POSTMASTERS and their ASSISTANTS, and all others who wish to increase their income, will find this an excellent opportunity.

SAMPLE COPIES sent free to all applicants. Send for one and enclose the addresses of your friends. Address simply THE MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York.

A Strange and Beautiful Dream.

BY A CITIZEN OF MORGANTOWN, WEST VA.

My first day of returning health, after many weeks of severe illness was a bright Sunday in this month. I was well enough to sit at an open window in my easy chair, and scent the soft breeze that fanned my pale cheek and revived my languid frame. The bell of our church was just beginning to ring and the familiar sound awakened in me an intense longing to be with my family once more a worshiper in the house of God. I took up my Bible and Prayer Book which had been placed ready on the table beside me, intending to begin to read when the hour of the eleven-o'clock service should commence, and in the meantime closed my eyes, and soothed my impatient wishing by picturing to myself the streets that led to our church, and the throngs that would now be entering it for the public worship of the day.

All at once I seemed to be walking toward the church yet prevented from gratifying my eager wish to enter by some irresistible though unseen hand. One by one the congregation, in their gay Sunday dresses, passed me by, and went in where I vainly strove to follow. The children, from the Sunday School, filed up the staircases into the audience room, and except a few stragglers, huraying in as feeling themselves late, I was left alone.

Suddenly I was conscious of some awful presence, and felt myself addressed by a voice of most sweet solemnity in words to this effect: "Mortal, who by divine mercy has just been permitted to return from the gates of the grave, pause before thou enterest God's holy house again; reflect how often thou hast profaned His solemn public worship by irreverence, or by inattention, which is in His solemn sight irreverence; consider well the privilege, the utspeakable benefit and blessing, of united prayer, lest, by again abusing it, thou tire the patience of thy long-suffering God, and tempt Him for ever to deprive thee of that which hitherto thou hast so little valued."

[illegible] my eyes and blush with conscious guilt, the gracious being continued in a milder tone: "I am one of those angels commissioned to gather the prayers of the saints, and form them into wreaths of odorous incense, that they may rise to the throne of God. Enter now with me, and thou shalt, for thy warning, be enabled to discern those among the devotions about to be offered which are acceptable to Him, and to see how few in number, how weak and unworthy they are."

As he ceased speaking I found myself by the side of the angel still, but within the church, and so placed that I could distinctly see every part of the building.

"Observe," said the angel, "that those prayers which come from the heart, and which alone ascend on high, will seem to be uttered aloud. They will be more or less audible in proportion to their earnestness; when thoughts wander, the sounds will grow faint, and even cease altogether.

This explained to me why the organist, though apparently playing with all her might, produced no sound, and why, presently after the service began, though the lips of many moved, and all appeared attentive, only a few faint murmurings were heard.

How strange and awful it was to note the sort of death-like silence that prevailed in whole pews, in which, as was thus evident, no heart was raised in gratitude to Heaven. There was a low murmuring, and then, distant and clear above all other sounds, a sweet childish voice softly and reverently repeated the Lord's Prayer. I turned in the direction of the sound, and distinguished among the children a very little boy. His hands were clasped together; as he knelt his eyes were closed, his gentle face composed in reverence; and as the angel wrote on his tablets the words that fell from those infant lips, his smile, like a sunbeam, illuminated the church for a moment, and I remembered the words of holy David, where he says, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise.'

Presently I was again reminded of a Scripture passage—the prayer of the publican. A wretched-looking man, who swept the crossing near the church, lounged into the centre aisle during the reading of the lessons, his occupation being for the hour suspended. The second lesson was the 24th chapter of St. Matthew. Some verses attracted his attention. He listened with more and more seriousness, until at length he put his hand over his face, and exclaimed aloud, "What will become of me at the day of judgment? Lord have mercy on me a sinner." That prayer was inserted on the angel's tablets. Oh, may it not stand alone, but be an awakening of better things! May God indeed have mercy on such poor neglected ones as he, and raise up some to teach them and care for their immortal souls!

"Thou art shocked at what thou hast observed," said the angel. "I will show thee greater abominations than these. God is strong and patient; He is provoked every day. Listen now, and thou shalt hear the THOUGHTS of all these people; so that thou shalt have some faint idea of the forbearance God continually exercises toward those who draw near to Him with their lips, while their hearts are far from Him."

As the angel spoke my ears were deafened with a clamor which would have been shocking in a public meeting, but which here in God's holy house was awfully profane. The countenances remained indeed as composed and serious as before; the lips moved with the words of prayer, but the phrases they uttered were of the world and its occupations.

"How shamefully late Mrs. Slack always comes!" said one woman, who saw her neighbor and a train of daughters bustle into the next pew. "What an example to set her family! Thank goodness, no one can accuse me of that sin!"

"New bonnets again already!" exclaimed the last comer, returning the neighborly glance from the other seat, ere she composed herself to the semblance of devotion.

"How they can afford it Heaven only knows, and their father owing all their Christmas bills yet. If my girls look shabby, at least we pay our debts."

"Ah, there is Tom S.," nodded a young man to his friend; he is growing quite religious and respectable, I declare. He has been at church two Sundays running; how much longer will the devout fit [illegible]

These were shocking and striking examples of irreverence. There were happily not many such; the involuntary wanderings of thought were more common.

I was much more interested in a young couple near me, whose attention for a considerable part of the service had been remarkable. From the dress of the young man, I judged him to be a clergyman; the lady wore deep mourning; they were evidently betrothed—they read out of one book. Gradually he forgot the awful presence in which he stood, his eyes wandered from the Bible to her gentle face, and fixing there, called off his thoughts from Heaven. "How good she is," he began to say; "how attentive to her prayers, as to all other duties! What a sweet wife she will make. How happy am I to have won her love." By this time the countenance of the girl wore an expression which showed that she felt the earnestness of his gaze: her eye-lids trembled, her attention wavered, and though she looked at the book some moments longer, she too, began to murmer of earthly things, and I heard her say: "Oh, how he loves me!—even here he cannot forget that I am beside him." It was many minutes before either of them returned in spirit to their devotions,

As the service proceeded, the attention of the congregation flagged more and more—the hubbub of worldly talk increased. One man composed a letter he intended to send and even altered whole passages and rounded elegant periods, without one check or recolection of the holy place where he stood. Another repeated a long dialogue which had passed between himself and a friend the night before, and considered how he might have spoken more to the purpose. Some young girls rehearsed scenes with their lovers; some recalled the incidents of their last ball. Careful housewives planned schemes of economy, gave warning to their servants, arranging the turning of a gown, or decided on the most becoming trimming for a bonnet.

To me, conscious of the recording angel's presence, all this solemn mockery of worship was frightful. I would have given worlds to rouse this congregation to a sense of what they were doing, and, to my comfort, I saw that for the voluntary offenders a gentle warning was provided.

A frown from the angel, or the waving of his impatient wings as if about to quit a place so desecrated, recalled the wandering thoughts of many a soul, unconscious whence came the breath that revived the dying flame of his devotions. Then self-blame, tears of penitence, and bitter remorse—of which those kneeling nearest knew nothing—wrung the heart-shocked of its own careless ingratitude, wondering at and adoring the forbearance of the Almighty, while more concentrated thoughts, and I trust more fervent prayer, succeeded to the momentary forgetfulness.

In spite of these helps, however, the amount of real devotion was small; and when I looked at the angel's tablets I was shocked to see how little was written therein.

Out of three hundred Christians, thought I, assembled after a week of mercies, to praise and bless the giver of all good, these few words are the the sum of what they offer.

"Look to thyself," said the angel, reading my inmost thoughts. "Such as these are, such hast though long been. Darest thou, after what hast been revealed to thee, act such a part again? Oh, could thy mortal ears bear to listen to the songs of the rejoicing angels, before the throne of the Almighty, thou wouldst indeed wonder at the condescending mercy which stoops to accept these few, faint wandering notes of prayer and praise. Yet the sinless angels veil their faces before Him in whose presence man stands boldly up with such mockery of worship as thou hast seen this day. Remember the solemn warning, lest hereafter it be accounted thee as an aggravation of guilt."

Suddenly the sweet solemn voice ceased, and the glorious angel disappeared: and so oppressive seemed the silence and loneliness, that I started and awoke. My watch pointed to the hour of eleven; it must have been the stopping of the bells that interrupted my slumbers, and all this solemn scene had passed before my mind in the short space of a few minutes.

May the lesson I learned in those few minutes never be effaced from m[illegible] And if this account [illegible] them should aid in recalling one wandering thought in the house of prayer, or teach any to value more highly and cultivate more carefully the privilege of joining in the public worship of the church it will not have been written in vain.

A Novel Cure for Scarlet Fever.

In his early life Dr. Richardson knew a gentleman—the late Dr. Pinckney—who had a novel way of treating scarlet fever. Whenever any one of his pupils—he was a schoolmaster—was seized with the disease he had the youth outside the playground, and, clothing him warmly, had him walked about until the perspiration streamed from every pore. This effected, the sufferer was taken indoors, put into a warm bed, charged with warm fluids and made still to perspire. The patient usually fell into a gentle sleep and in nearly every case was virtually cured at once.—Glasgow Herald.

"When am I going to get that new suit of clothes I ordered three weeks ago?" asked Gilhooly of his tailor, Herr Schneider.

"Choost as soon as you pays for dot oder suit I makes you last year."

"But, my good fellow I can't f- a ford to wait that long."—Siftings.

The difficulty of running a country newspaper is fully shown by the editor of the Smithville, (Ga.) News, who explains the absence of editorial matter in a recent issue as follows: "A man can't cut three cords of oak wood a day and then sit calmly down and collect his ideas when he can't collect his money."

An exchange tantalizes its readers with this atrocity: "Have you heard of the man who got shot? "Got shot! No, how did he get shot." "He bought them."

There is no change in the style of fishing tackle this year, except that the jug has more body and not so much neck.

"No," said a Smithburg girl, "no electric light for me. It can't be turned down low enough."

IN THE POOR-HOUSE.

[A lady of a wealthy Eastern family, through some estrangement, left her home and went to the West. Misfortune and ill-health swept away her little all, and in her old age she found a home in the poor-house. One evening shortly after, she was found sitting by her bed, reading the poem: "Rock Me to Sleep, Mother," and weeping. That night the death angel came, and the tired feet rested on "the echoless shore."]

"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep,"
Why does the reader pause? Why does she weep?
Withered the quiv'ring lips, head bowing low,
Care-worn the wrinkled face where the tears flow;
Far from her childhood home, old and alone,
No one, and nothing, to claim as her own;
Fortune and friends all are lost in the past,
Found, in her old age, the poor-house at last.

"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep,"
Trembles the voice, for the mem'ries that sweep
Far from the sunny land when she was young,
Rush o'er her heart as a harp long unstrung.
Music that once has charmed, chords lost so long,
Come from the silence so long and so deep—
"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep."

"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep,"
Just as when weary of playing "Bo Peep"
Long, long ago, she would turn to her breast,
Yearning for love words and kisses and rest.
Turns she to night, a child now once more;
"Mother, come back from the echoless shore"
What do her dim eyes see? What does she hear?
Why does she linger where tear follows tear?
Over and over in sobs low and deep—
"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep."

Morn came: the sun, like a fond mother's face,
Woke earth with a kiss from night's still embrace;
Hushed were those lips in that peaceful repose
Only the friendless who finds it o'er knows.
Mother had come from "the echoless shore."
Clasped her again in her arms as of yore;
Open the book lay beside the lone dead.
Tear-marked the lines o'er and o'er she had read,
Nevermore here o'er to wake or to weep—
"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep."

"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep,"
Oh! when the night shadows round the heart creep,
When all the strife and the toiling are done,
Empty and prizeless the fame we have won;
Friends whom we loved passed away from our sight,
Hopes we have cherished all buried in night,
Fondly we turn to our childhood again,
Longing for love and caresses, as then;
Once more the words from the weary heart leap—
"Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep."

MR. TIDYWAITE.

His Service as Special Constable and What Came of It.

No slight sensation was occasioned in the household of Mr. Joseph Tidywaite, the senior partner in Tidywaite, Chink & Bullen's Bank, Pall Mall, when that gentleman announced his intention of enrolling himself as a special constable.

"Surely, Joseph, there are plenty of younger men available!" said Mrs. Tidywaite.

"Younger men! Pshaw!" exclaimed the valiant banker, drawing himself up, like a hero of romance, to his full height, which was just 5 ft. 6½ in. "We must show the youngsters that a man need not be past serving his country at fifty-nine."

"But consider the weather, Joseph, and your rheumatism," continued his wife.

"Think of your asthma, papa, dear, and those dreadful fogs," added Miss Tidywaite.

"Nonsense, nonsense!" replied Mr. Tidywaite, a little impatiently; for, to tell the truth, he had thought a good deal about all these circumstances already. "It is a matter of duty, Eliza. Besides, I have promised Lord Bayswater that I will serve. He called at the bank this morning to obtain recruits, and I wish to set the clerks an example."

Mr. Tidywaite expected that the allusion to Lord Bayswater would have effect upon his wife, and he was not disappointed. Miss Tidywaite, however, a young lady of much sense, as well as independence, was not so easily silenced.

"I can't see why they want to call out special constables at all," she observed. "There are not to be any more attempts to hold meetings in Trafalgar Square; and, if the people had not been stopped from going there, there would have been none of this disturbance."

"And where did you learn that, pray?" inquired the banker sharply, and casting a suspicious glance at his daughter.

Winfred blushed slightly, and turned away. "I have heard people say it," she replied. "But, papa, dear, if there be any danger, as you say, surely the police and the military are sufficient without the help of old gent—I mean persons in your position!"

"My dear Winifred," replied her father, "you must excuse my saying that you do not understand what you are talking about. The magnificent spectacle of a mass of law-abiding citizens marshalled in support of the civil and military forces will of itself strike terror into the mob, and nip the spirit of anarchy in the bud."

Winifred was a devoted daughter, but she had a sense of humor, and the magnificent spectacle of her father striking terror into the mob was more than she could discuss with gravity. The subject consequently dropped. Later on, however, when Mr. and Mrs. Tidywaite found themselves alone, Joseph suddenly said to his wife:

"Has Ted O'Brien been here again?"

"Not to my knowledge," replied the lady. "Why do you ask?"

"Because I am convinced that no one but O'Brien could have put that Radical claptrap about the special constables and the people into Winifred's head."

"I think that she met him last night at Mrs. Somerset's, Joseph."

"Then understand that I distinctly forbid her to go to Mrs. Somerset's again," said the banker, angrily, "or anywhere else where she is likely to meet that young jackanapes. He has quite turned the girl's head. We shall have her defying her own father next."

Now, Mr. Edward O'Brien was a young relative of Mrs. Tidywaite, who had come to London from Dublin to study medicine. Although he had distinguished himself at the hospitals, he was still on the threshold of his profession, and, as his private means were small, he was hardly an eligible son-in-law for the senior partner in Tidywaite, Chink & Bullen. Moreover, he was an earnest Nationalist and a thoroughgoing Radical, and in those characters doubly obnoxious to Mr. Tidywaite. When, therefore, the banker was apprised that an attachment had grown up between his daughter Winifred and the young doctor, he promptly ordered the latter out of the house and requested that the subject should never be mentioned again.

On the morning after the above conversation Mr. Tidywaite, accompanied by Mr. Chink, his partner, and a formidable body of their employes, was duly sworn in as a special constable. He had his first taste of active service on the following Sunday, when, after he had duly rendezvoused at Albany street barracks at eleven a. m., he was marched through the mud and the fog, perspiring and breathless, to Cavendish Square, and there "held in reserve" till about five p. m. The mob, to do them justice, did not appear overawed by the spectacle; on the contrary, they occupied themselves throughout the above period with facetious comments on the appearance of the "specials," individually and collectively. Mr. Tidywaite, although he had contrived to get into the rear rank, came in for his share of this fun, and he went home with the rudiments of a bad cold, an unpleasant stiffness in the legs, and an aggravated sense of grievance against the lower orders generally; but, fortunately, with nothing worse. A week or two later, however, his fortitude and sense of duty were put to a sharper test. He received a notice that, in view of the threatening demonstration being organized at the other side of London, the regular constables on duty in his district would be withdrawn in the evening, and special constables, in pairs, would replace them on their beats. The beat assigned to Mr. Tidywaite included Portland Square, Duchess Place and several adjoining streets in the West End.

The day duly arrived, and a dreadful day it was. Heavy snow in the morning was succeeded by a general drizzle as the day wore on. The cold which Mr. Tidywaite had caught in Cavendish Square had now assumed portentous dimensions and settled on his chest. His rheumatism was also troublesome. At the last moment Mrs. Tidywaite was anxious for a medical certificate, but, unluckily, did not think of it till too late, and she was about to help her husband get ready for his work when they were informed that the police superintendent desired to see Mr. Tidywaite.

"I just called, sir," said the officer, "to warn you to keep a sharp lookout on No. 9 Portland Square. It is the Duke of Dublin's house. He is the President of the Irish Landlords' Ancient Rights Maintenance League, you know, sir."

"Ah, certainly. You are not anticipating any attack on the Duke's house, I hope?" inquired Mr. Tidywaite, rather anxiously.

"No; but we have standing instructions to look after the residences of gentlemen in the Duke's position, and we know the dynamiters are very active again just now."

"Dear me, how dreadful! And can you tell me who will be with me on my beat?"

"The Hon. Guy Wyldfire, sir—Lord Littlebrain's youngest son. You will find him a very pleasant young gentleman, I think. Good night, sir. Sorry you have such a nasty evening."

This interview did not raise Mr. Tidywaite's spirits. On the contrary, it filled him with uneasiness. It was his rule never to keep firearms in the house, but he wished now that he had had a pistol that he could put in his pocket to supplement the protection of his truncheon. As it was, he could muster no more deadly weapon than a pair of handcuffs, which he had purchased shortly after being sworn in, as likely to be of service in the event of his having to effect an arrest. These he now stowed away in one of his deepest pockets, while Mrs. Tidywaite assisted him in his other preparations, wrapping a good length of stout flannel around his knee—the rheumatic one—and stuffing his pockets with sausage-rolls, sandwiches, a flask or two of comforting cordials, and a plentiful stock of cough lozenges. Thus provisioned, and encased in [illegible] goloshes, the banker marched forth.

"Stop, Joseph! stop!" cried his wife, as the door was closing on him. "You are going without your respirator."

"I didn't forget it, my dear," said the old gentleman, rather nervously. "But I thought that it would look—a—that is, that I should hardly require——"

"Look or no look, Joseph," replied his wife, who was accustomed to be obeyed in such matters, "you put on that respirator before you go outside the door."

Poor Joseph submitted with the best grace he could. The respirator was duly adjusted, and the good man made the best of his way to the spot where he was to relieve the regular constable, and where he found not only Hon. Guy Wyldfire, but also a select quorum of street boys and loafers who had come to see the fun.

"O, my eye! 'Ere's the City Corporation been and swore hisself in as a speshul!" ejaculated one of the bystanders at the sight of Mr. Tidywaite's portly form.

"Hallo, copper; when did you see your toes last?" inquired another.

"I say, Bill," said a third, "what's the bloke been and gagged hisself for?"

"To save his false teeth from bein' knocked down his throat, most likely," replied Bill.

"Please, sir, be you the speshul or the hextra, or the hextra speshul?" cried a cheeky Arab.

Amid an encouraging chorus in this key the two constables started on their rounds. They walked slowly over the extent of their beat, and then came to a standstill in Portland Square. Snow had now set in again vigorously, and a keen northeaster drove the flakes in the faces of the two specials, and caused the elder to shiver beneath his wraps.

"Do you think," said the banker, presently, "that it would appear—a—unprofessional if I were to put up an umbrella?"

"Contrary to all the regulations," replied Mr. Wyldfire, who kept up his spirits very creditably under the circumstances. "Don't you let the Inspector catch you at it! I think, though, that I can put you up to a better dodge than that."

"Pray, what is it?" inquired Mr. Tidywaite, much interested.

"P 73, the peeler on the beat, tipped me a wink as he was going away, and whispered that we should find No. 24 the right sort of shop. I can't say what he meant, but I caught a glimpse of a larky-looking slavey at No. 24 Duchess Place, as we came by. I mean to have another look. If you'll stop here a minute I will return anon and report progress." And, without further explanation, the scion of the aristocracy departed. At the end of about a quarter of an hour he returned, visibly satisfied with the result of his mission.

"It's all right," he said. "P 73 is a brick. There's a comfortable kitchen entirely at our disposal at No. 24. The slavies are full of fun. The family are out, and I've sent for a bottle of whisky. Come on!"

The banker gazed at his comrade in blank amazement.

"You don't mean to say," he gasped, "that you expect me to——"

"Why not? What's the use of playing at peeler if you don't do the thing properly?"

"But what about the beat, and the Duke's house here?"

"O, they'll look after themselves for half an hour. For the matter of that, it wouldn't be much loss to society if the Fenians were to blow old Dublin into smithereens. You had better come. The cook's a topper, I can tell you—just your sort."

Had it been any one else than an Earl's son who spoke, Mr. Tidywaite would undoubtedly have met this ribald speech with the rebuke it merited. As it was, he contented himself with declining the invitation as stiffly as politeness permitted.

"As you please," said the Honorable Guy. "You will know where to find me if I am wanted. No. 24; don't forget. Ta-ta!"

He was soon out of sight, and Mr. Tidywaite was left alone with his own reflections. Solitude did not add to the charms of his situation. The storm seemed to be steadily increasing in violence, and though he had no desire to imitate the example of Mr. Wyldfire, the banker presently moved round his beat, looking for a chance of gaining shelter. He came thus to No. 9—the Duke of Dublin's house. It was a fine mansion, with a large portico extending to the pavement; and, remembering his instructions from the Inspector, Mr. Tidywaite thought he would be doing his duty, as well as consulting his inclination, if he stood up against one of the pillars at the side, sheltered from the wind. He stood there about a quarter of an hour, his toes numbed and his teeth chattering, when the clock of a neighboring church struck nine. The last stroke had scarcely ceased when Mr. Tidywaite was startled by a low whistle close at hand. Looking out from his shelter he perceived a tall man, in an ulster, standing under a neighboring lamp-post. As if in response to the whistle, two other men hurried up from opposite directions. Their movements were so mysterious that the special constable drew back as far out of sight as he could get. The men were now talking together, and the Inspector's instructions—the allusion to the Duke of Dublin and the dynamiters—recurred painfully to Mr. Tidywaite's mind as he caught fragments of the conversation in a rich Milesian brogue.

In another minute or so the two last-comers again departed in opposite directions, and Mr. Tidywaite's heart sank into his boots as he saw the tall man advance stealthily towards No. 7. He was now close alongside the special and looking into the area, beyond doubt with some sinister purpose. The inclination to fly was almost irresistible in Mr. Tidywaite's breast, but he summoned up all his sense of public duty, and with a supreme effort stepped out and accosted the mysterious stranger.

"Now, sir," he said, "what is your business here?"

"What has that to do with you?" returned the man.

"I am a representative of the law, and it is my duty to ask what you are doing."

"And suppose I don't tell you?"

"Then I must ask you to come along with me."

"And suppose I say I sha'n't come?" said the man with a contemptuous laugh.

"Then I shall arrest you in the Queen's name," replied the valiant constable. And producing his handcuffs he made a vicious grab at the stranger. Perhaps the tall man was taken aback at this unexpected display of resolute government. At any rate, he stood quite still much to Mr. Tidywaite's relief, and allowed the bracelets to be slipped on to his wrists. Then he began to move off.

"Stop!" cried the special; "we are going the other way."

"I ain't!" said the tall man. "You can if you like."

Unfortunately, however, Mr. Tidywaite had taken the precaution of attaching the handcuffs tightly round his own waist. The prisoner showed no disposition to stop, and as his advantage in strength more than counterbalanced the special's superiority in weight, and as, moreover, the pavement was too slippery to afford any foothold for resistance, Mr. Tidywaite felt himself reluctantly compelled to follow.

"Help, help!" he cried, frantically, as he found himself being hurried into a trot.

The two confederates came running up at the sound of his voice.

"Stuff his respirator into his mouth, Mike," said the tall man, "and tie his muffler over it, or he'll rouse the whole neighborhood."

This was quickly done, in spite of Mr. Tidywaite's resistance, and the unfortunate special found himself again dragged off behind his prisoner, while each one of the accomplices held one of his arms.

There was just one hope, he thought, of escape. He was being marched towards Baker street, where he knew that other special constables were on duty. The idea, however, seemed to strike the conspirators as soon as himself, for, at a word from the tall man, one of the others presently took the key of the handcuffs from Mr. Tidywaite's pocket, and in another moment the special himself was handcuffed, while the tall man took possession of the truncheon and transferred the constable's armlet to his own arm. No sooner was this done than they met a pair of specials on their beat.

"It's all right," said the tall man, in answer to a question from one of the constables. "He was drunk and disorderly, and assaulted this gentleman here. But we've got him safe enough now." Poor Mr. Tidywaite was just attempting to explain matters when he was hurriedly carried on by his captors, and not allowed to again stop until the party arrived at a dingy-looking house in the neighborhood of High street, Marylebone, where the prisoner was conducted to a large room, scantily furnished, in the upper part of the house.

A very few minutes' observation satisfied the terrified banker that he was in a nest of conspirators of a dark and malignant character. To begin with, his three companions, as they entered the house, one and all assumed black masks. They exchanged remarks, too, in a language which Mr. Tidywaite had never heard before, and addressed one another by numbers instead of names. The prisoner was bidden to sit down at one end of the room. His pockets were turned out and his stock of provisions were distributed among the gang, who disposed of them, excepting the cough lozenges, with evident relish. Then, on his solemnly swearing neither to move nor speak, the handcuffs were removed, and an individual known apparently as "Number Siven" took up his post beside him, pistol in hand. In the course of half an hour two or three desperadoes, all masked and armed, dropped in and took their seats at a table at the other end of the room. When half a dozen were thus assembled "Number Siven," at a word from the tall man, led the prisoner into a small room adjoining. "The Council are going to consider your case," said Number Siven. "Ye'll know your sinthence in the course of half an hour. In the meantime keep quiet, or ye're a did man."

"One moment," whispered the banker, as his jailer was about to leave the room. "You can not object to tell me where you are and where I am."

"Sure ye can guess!"

"I may be wrong; let me know the worst."

"Ye're just in the hands of the Clan-na-Gael, and the gintlemen to whom ye've been introjuiced are the Executive Council of the London Division—more power to them!" And with that Number Siven hastily retired.

Heavens what a situation! The banker's head reeled, and he wiped the perspiration from his brow. Presently he looked around the room but it contained no window, nor any hope of escape or succor. For half an hour or more he remained there, listening to the voices in the next room, at the end of which time he was reduced to the last stage of mental and bodily prostration. Then Number Siven returned, revolver in hand, and led him into the presence of the Council, who were seated round a table, all masked.

"Joseph Tidywaite," said the Chairman, whom the banker at once recognized as the tall man whom he had captured in the square, "you have been charged with being an inimy of Oireland, and with thwarting an important operation of the Provisional Government. The Council have considered your case, and your sinthence is—Death by the Third Process."

The wretched man essayed to speak, but terror tied his tongue, and he clung to Number Siven to save himself from falling.

"The Council have, however, mercifully attached a proviso to the sinthence," pursued the Chairman. "Your life will be spared on condition of your taking the oath of fidelity to the Oirish Republic. Ye will have five minutes to make your election. Siven, give the prisoner a chair!"

At the expiration of five minutes, Mr. Tidywaite made the choice that might have been expected, and took the oath of fidelity to the Irish Republic, in the following terms:

"I, Joseph Tidywaite, hereby solemnly renounce all allegiance to the Queen of Great Britain, her heirs and successors, and declare myself a true and loyal subject of the Irish Republic, to the Executive Government of which for the time being I swear henceforward to render with body and soul unconditional obedience, for good or evil, for life or death. So help me God."

This oath having been administered, Mr. Tidywaite signed the document in blood from one of his own veins, which Number Siven dexterously opened for the purpose with a lancet. The ceremony over, he drank "God Save Ireland" in some hot whisky and water, and was then blindfolded, led out of house, and restored to freedom in the shape of a hansom cab.

It was nearly a fortnight before the doctor allowed Mr. Tidywaite to leave his bed, but as soon as he was able to get about again the old gentleman sent for Edward O'Brien. On the young man's arrival he at once narrated the story of his terrible experience.

"I sent for you, Edward," he said, at the conclusion of the recital, "in the hope that you might have influence with some of your Irish friends which would help me out of my horrible position. Think of it, Edward! Think of me sworn body and soul to the service of a treasonable conspiracy! How can I, as an honest citizen, evade my duty to disclose the whole business to the Government?"

"Good God!" exclaimed O'Brien. "How can you talk of such a thing! Do you know what it means! Remember James Carey!"

"I know, I know," replied the wretched banker. I am aware of my peril, and the knowledge is driving me mad. Can't you help me, Edward?"

"If things had been otherwise," said O'Brien, presently—"I mean if there had been any tie between you and me on the strength of which I might have made a personal appeal to the Executive, I tell you frankly there is no man in London who has a better right to ask a favor of the Clanna-Gael than I have. But as it is, on what ground can I appeal to them?"

"My dear Edward," replied the banker, "I have never desired more than to be convinced that you and Winifred were sincerely attached to one another. If my consent to the engagement—conditionally, of course, on your rendering me this service—will facilitate your negotiations with the Council, pray consider you have it."

This assurance did facilitate matters very much. Two or three days later O'Brien reported that, after a difficult negotiation with the leaders of the Clanna-Gael, he had persuaded the Council, in recognition of his own services to the cause, to rescind Mr. Tidywaite's oath of allegiance, on his swearing perpetual secrecy as to his own relations with the Clan. A few days later the banker was conducted again, this time by O'Brien, to the headquarters of the London Division. Here certain formalities were gone through, the oath of allegiance was rescinded, and the special constable found himself once more a faithful subject of the Queen.

Early in the honeymoon O'Brien told his wife how her father's consent to their marriage had been obtained.

"But I don't understand it now," said Winifred, when she had heard the story of her father's singular adventure. "Who were the other conspirators? And who planned it all?"

"The conspirators, my dear, were a party of promising medicals from St. Mary's reinforced by one or two of our compatriots from Guy's. It was my respected best man, Jim Sullivan, who captured your father. He met you at a dance, you may remember, where you told him the governor was going as a special. He planned the business—bless his soul!—as a mere practical joke at first. We developed the idea afterwards."

"Poor papa!" said Winifred. "I wonder he survived it. He must never know, Ted."

And he never did.—London Truth.

THE WINGS OF BIRDS.

Their Position When in Flight Shown by Instantaneous Photography.

Our readers have been made aware, from time to time, of the remarkable results obtained by M. Marey in his instantaneous photographs of various animals when progressing from place to place. A large number of photographs of men in the acts of walking, running and jumping have been given, and also, a la Muybridge, of horses in motion in various kinds of gaits. But perhaps the most interesting series of the whole is that relating to the flight of birds. In La Nature a number of illustrations taken from M. Marey's negatives are given, and they show a most remarkable and interesting set of positions. M. Muybridge's pictures were a great source of wonderment and amusement when first introduced, on account of the very strange shapes into which the limbs of his horse seemed to be contorted; and here, instead of those beautiful pictures of birds, with their pinions extended above the body as is wont to characterize the Western representatives of bird-motion (the Chinese and the Japanese draw their flying birds indifferently, with wings either depressed or raised) we see their pinions in as many and as remarkable positions as those of the celebrated horses above alluded to. In some the wing tips are high in the air, in others quite low and beneath, and, indeed, in front of the body; while, again, in still different views of the same bird we seem to see nothing but wings, apparently extended to imitate an umbrella. The pictures of the pelican are particularly ludicrous. It is desirable, again, to point out with regard to such photographs that their value is not for artistic but for physiological uses.—British Journal of Photography.

THE PATIENT TRAVELER.

He Couldn't Manage Baby, But Whipped an Individual of His Own Size.

Just this side of Bloomington a baby in the rear of the car began to cry. He was a lusty-lunged little fellow, and made more noise than half a dozen babies ought to have. The passengers turned—a good many of them with no very pleasant expressions on their faces—to investigate. They found a man holding the little one, and doing his best to quiet him. There was no woman in sight. That was what the tiny sufferer wanted—a woman—his mother—to drive away all his little troubles and soothe him into quiet slumber. The man did all he could. He was a large, benevolent-looking man, with a sad, melancholy expression and a world of tenderness in his eyes as he looked down at the little bundle of humanity and rocked it to and fro. But the baby refused to be comforted and screamed the louder. So it went for a dozen miles. The other passengers were growing impatient, and two or three of them got up and went forward. There was a touch of sympathy in some faces, but more bore a scowl. Neither seemed to make any difference with the baby—he screamed louder, if any thing, as the train sped on. The man who held him was weary, but still he bent over his little charge and sought in low words—clumsy baby talk—to hush his weeping. There was a man in the next seat in front—a cold, hard-featured man—who had been disturbed in reading a book. Half a dozen times he turned and looked at the man working with the baby. Each time he glanced with a deeper scowl. Still the other strove to soothe the little one. "There, there, don't oo cry so! Maybe oo mama ——" He stopped.

"If you can't keep that howling brat of yours still," said the hard-featured man as he turned in his seat, "you'd better chuck it out the window!"

The man with the baby glanced up surprised, pained. For the space of half a minute he looked the other full in the eye, and then he leaned forward and with a voice choking with emotion said:

"This young one isn't mine! A dodgasted woman gave it to me to hold while she made a fool trip forward to the baggage car to see if they'd got her trunk, and I guess she's never coming back! But I'll be dashed if you can run on me!" And he dumped the baby down in one end of the seat, and, with an altogether different look in his eye, jumped out in the aisle and got the hard-featured man by the collar, and jammed him down on the floor between the seats, and got up on him with both feet, and took hold of the hat-rack with his hands, and raised himself up and dropped back on the hard-featured man till he had the features pretty well softened up. And it appeared quite as if he would have been going up and down like a pile-driver yet if the woman who owned the baby hadn't flounced back into the car and rescued the infant and quieted him in about ten seconds, and told him in a loud, clear voice that she didn't know she'd left her little, darling, pwecious baby boy with a great, big, ugly prize-fighter. Then the benevolent man quit jumping and went and sat down in another seat with his face very red, while the hard-featured party crawled up looking as if he would have to carry his features in a sling for three weeks.—F. H. Carruth, in Chicago Tribune.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Lieutenant Rogers Predicts the Ultimate Completion of the Great Work.

No exact estimate of the time and money required to finish the canal can be made, as much of the data needed is unknown. M. Charles de Lesseps said to me: "In two years the canal will be finished from Colon to kilometer forty-four, and from La Boca to Paraiso. As to the Culebra, I leave you to form your own conclusions. It is a great and difficult work."

It is evident that the rate of excavation in a work of such magnitude must be small until the plant is complete; it is equally true that more work can be done in a given time with a complete installation than with one of less size. Hence it is false reasoning to conclude that if 32,000,000 cubic meters are excavated in five years, it will require twelve years to extract the remaining 73,000,000. That such reasoning is absurd is shown by the cube of last year, which was 11,727,000 cubic meters. At this rate it would require about seven years to complete the canal. It is not probable that this rate will be exceeded materially for a year or more.

Keeping in mind the sum already expended, and the purposes to which it was applied, it is unreasonable to presume that the final cost of the canal will be less than 2,000,000,000 francs, or about $375,000,000. These figures are now acknowledged by the company; but owing to the great sacrifice at which the loans are obtained, the liabilities of the company will be nearly double this amount.

Any views concerning the completion of the canal by the present company must be conjectural; but if the present loan be expended with economy the results will enhance the prospects of success.

At Colon there were many residents and foreigners not interested in the canal. The most bitter opponents of the enterprise were Americans and Englishmen, or former employes of the company who had been discharged or had a similar grievance. But from all sources there was a free admission that the company has both brains and energy, that the canal presents no insuperable obstacles, and that its completion is a question of time and money.—Lieutenant Charles C. Rogers, in Popular Science Monthly.

ANCIENT MOSAICS.

Interesting Historical Specimens Representing Mythological Subjects.

Mosaic was applied with good effect by the Romans to portraiture, which gained in durability what it lost in finish. Instances are given of Caracalla's gladiators and the friends of the Emperor Commodus, whose portraits were erected in a portico of his garden. Early in the first century B. C., mosaic had become a necessary part of official furniture, and Mr. Parry quotes Suetonius, who tells us how Cæsar carried mosaic about in his campaigns that his official "pavement" might be always ready. The common adoption of mosaic suggested the use of native materials. Where marbles could not be obtained stones of various colors and clay, baked red or black, were employed. Frequently, as has been remarked before, the composition is so superior to the execution that it is impossible not to believe that the originals were the work of able artists. And thus an additional interest is imparted to mosaics as preserving some record of the composition of ancient pictures and wall paintings. Interesting as mosaics are which represent mythological subjects, those are even more interesting which illustrate contemporary life. "One of the best examples of the kind is the great mosaic of Italica near Seville." This represents the interior of a Roman circus, and bears testimony to the importance of a city of which little remains, though it was founded by Scipio Africanus, and was the birthplace of the Emperors Trajan, Hadrian and Theodosius. A still finer specimen of mosaic representing the entire scene of the circus is at Lyons. This is fully described, and is an excellent illustration of the lively interest taken by the Romans in the games of the circus. Another favorite subject was taken from the kingdom of Neptune. There is a good instance of this on the coast of Spain, on the floor of the Church of St. Michael at Barcelona, "where the whole glory of the ocean kingdom is portrayed in mosaic, with fishes, nereids, and tritons sporting among the waves, and indicating the spot once occupied by a temple of Neptune." These subjects were very popular toward the close of the first century A. D., a fact attributed to the extension of Roman commerce by sea. Of all such designs the palm is given by Mr. Gambler Parry to the mosaic found at Constantine, described in glowing language, which should be studied, as it contains, among other memorable expressions, a fine euphemism for "naked" viz., "relieved of all impediments of drapery." The marine deities who enjoy this privilege are Neptune and Amphitrite.—Edinburgh Review.

A MARVELOUS MACHINE.

It Has Ruled as High as Forty Thousand Lines to the Inch.

Dr. H. A. Rowland, of the Johns Hopkins University, has a new engine for ruling his plates for spectrum analysis or decomposition of light. This engine was made entirely at the university under his personal supervision, and is the result of the most careful, painstaking effort. The most important part of it—the screw and its attachments for regulating the width of the lines—was carefully ground under water kept at a constant temperature, so as to avoid all error arising from expansion and contraction, and is guarded against so small an error as one-hundred-thousandth of an inch. The engine is run by water power, and is inclosed in a glass case and kept in a double-walled brick chamber in the basement, so as to provide as equable temperature as possible. So delicate is the machinery that while it is running the case is kept closed, as the heat from a person's body would affect it. The new machine at first was not satisfactory, but now the worst ruled plates by it are better than the best ruled by the old one. The old one hardly ruled more than 10,000 lines to the inch, while the new one has ruled as high as 40,000, and can be graduated to rule an almost infinite number, but the metal usually crumbles, and the lines run into each other above twenty thousand to the inch. The plates are highly polished, and are made of what is known as speculum metal, though glass is sometimes used for experimental purposes. The prepared plate is placed on the machine, and the screw regulated to the required distance, and when the machine starts it moves the plate the distance, say, one-twenty-thousandth of an inch, and a small diamond point runs across and draws the line while the plate is stationary. It is a matter of infinite care, and several days are necessary for ruling a plate three or four inches in diameter. The diamond point can be so arranged as to vary every fiftieth or one-hundredth line, while at the end of the engine is a small counting machine for recording the number of lines drawn. In an adjoining room is a very costly instrument for measuring the width of the lines, and so marvelously accurate is it that an error of one hundred-thousandth part of an inch, or even less, can be detected. The rulings of this machine are the finest in the world, and have been sent to different parts of the scholarly portion of it, one of the largest and best plates being presented to Prof. Helmholtz, the world-famous physicist of Berlin. If a perfect machine means one that perfectly does the work it was designed for this is probably the most perfect one in the world.—Baltimore Sun.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

LOST AND FOUND.

A Story of the Boyhood of the "Wise Men of Gotham."

May be in Essex, may be in Kent,
Or on the borders of the Trent,
Somewhere they dwelt, I know not where,
These twelve six men, so wise and rare.
Gotham was called their native town,
Search for it up, search for it down;
But though their dwelling we can not fix,
You now shall hear their clever tricks.

These men, when boys, went out to bathe one day.
A lovely morning in the month of May.
The sun it shone upon the river bright,
While in they plunged and swam with all their might.
They dived and floated, shouting merrily,
And were as full of fun as boys can be.

But when, the play all over, they were dressed,
They said among themselves: "'Twould sure be best
To see if, now we've had our pleasant game,
We are as many as when out we came."
Then one began to count; but he with awe
Said that eleven, and no more, he saw.
He thought that he had told the lot;
To count himself he quite forgot.

"You must be wrong," another said. "Let me Go through them, and they'll all come right, you'll see."
Gaily he said: "One, two, three, four"—until
He reached eleven, when his heart stood still!
He thought that he had told the lot;
To count himself he quite forgot.

Then each lad, thinking he could reckon best,
Tried, but to find eleven like the rest.
Each thought that he had told the lot—
And each to count himself forgot.

Then it was true! they'd learned it to their cost;
One of the merry party had been lost,
And now their fear and horror found relief
In loud lament and tears of bitter grief.

Just at this time a traveler passed by
And sought to know the reason of their cry.
"Ho! Gotham lads," he cried, "what's all this clatter?
Come near, and tell me what there is the matter."

"Dear sir," one answered, "when we left our home
Twelve of us did unto the river come,
But now eleven only can we find,
Yet know not which it is we've left behind."
In chorus they all sobbed: "Boo-hoo, Boo-hoo.
We see that one is drowned, we don't know who."

The traveler loudly laughed. "My lads," said he,
"'Tis really sad that you so sharp should be,
For boys, they say who're so uncommon clever
Live to grow up to manhood hardly ever.
Now lie down on the ground in two straight rows,
And in the sand make holes, each with his nose."

When they a little time thus still had laid
He bade them rise, and count the holes they'd made.
O, then to gladness turned their deep despair,
For, looking on the ground, twelve holes were there.

To tell their joy it would be vain to strive,
As they with rapture cried: "We're all alive!
Thank you, kind sir, for finding our lost brother!"
"Right welcome, lads," the jolly traveler said,
"And now he home, each youngster to his mother!"
And then he laughed and laughed and shook his head.

ADOPTING A GRANDFATHER.

Daisy and Dannie's Pleasant Surprise for Their Mamma.

"Oh, dear, whatever shall we do next?"

Two forlorn little faces were pressed against the window, as four blue eyes looked out at the snow, which was having a merry frolic all to itself, playing mischievous pranks on those who ventured out of doors, without respect to age or person.

"I don't know," said Daisy, thoughtfully. "We've played 'pussy wants a corner,' and 'where's the thimble?' and 'hide and seek,' and 'tit, tat, toe,' and mamma hasn't come yet. She said she'd be here, sure, by the time we'd played all the games. I s'pose we might begin and play 'em all over again," she added, soberly, flattening her nose against the window-pane, until even papa, who loved his little daughter so dearly, would scarcely have recognized that queer-looking face as belonging to his Daisy.

"I don't want to play games. I want to go out and snowball," said Dan, impatiently. "Mrs. Brown never lets mamma come home when she 'runs in' just for a minute."

"But you mustn't go out in the snow, Dannie, Mamma said not."

"She meant you. Course girls can't go without getting sick. Girls ain't big and stout like boys."

Dan stretched up to his full height as he made this speech, and put on a very wise expression.

"I'm taller than you," cried Daisy, indignantly, with an angry sparkle in her blue eyes.

"That's all you know about it," said Dan. "Who weighs the most? Just tell me that!"

"You do," admitted Daisy, faintly, "and we're both just of an age; but I'm the tallest, anyhow."

"You cheated, you know you did!" retorted Dan.

And then an ominous silence fell between the little brother and sister who seldom quarreled with each other.

Dan tried to whistle—he was just learning how, and imagined he could whistle any tune—but somehow the whistle stuck in his throat, and his lips forgot the proper pucker.

Daisy didn't even try to appear unconcerned; for how could she, with the tell-tale tears filling her eyes and running over, making damp little spots on her white apron front?

Pretty soon Dan saw the bright tear-drops, and his conscience upbraided him as being the cause of his little sister's grief.

"Daisy, don't you wish that somebody'd leave a baby on our door step?" he asked, suddenly, as though nothing unpleasant had occurred.

"Oh, don't I, though!" exclaimed Daisy, with a sunshiny smile driving the shadow from her face. One sweep of her chubby hand across her eyes, and all trace of tears had disappeared. "I wouldn't be a bit surprised if they did some time, and course we'd adopt it if they did."

"Of course we would," replied Dan, decidedly. "If we found one there when mamma was gone, we'd adopt it ourselves."

"Oh, let's run an' seef" suggested Daisy, eagerly.

"Let's," agreed Dan.

And away the little ones scampered to examine the front door-step; but though they searched the entry, the broad porch without, and even went so far as to look under the steps, they failed to find the baby "in a basket," and were about abandoning their search in despair, when Dan's bright eyes caught sight of a little old man in the street, who seemed to be dreadfully perplexed about something, for he was standing quite still, gazing steadily at the number on the front door of the next house.

"Daisy," said Dan, in a subdued whisper, "we haven't got a grandfather anywhere."

"No," replied Daisy, with a sigh.

"Babies are lots of bother; but grandfathers are just splendid," remarked Dan.

"I've always wanted a grandfather," said Daisy, with a growing interest.

"Then let's adopt him," said Dan, quickly. "Mamma'll be so glad when she gets home."

"Let's," echoed Daisy.

The twins ran down the steps, hand-in-hand, and Dannie accosted the little old man, who seemed to have lost his way.

"We want you for a grandfather," he said, innocently—"me and Daisy do."

The old man turned about quickly, and the moment his eye fell upon the small, animated faces, he exclaimed:

"Why, to-be-sure—to-be-sure you do!"

He stooped and kissed them both.

"I don't see how you youngsters knew me, though. Did your mother send you out to fetch me in?"

"Oh, no!" replied Daisy. "It's to be a surprise for mamma."

"Sure enough, sure enough," said the old man, merrily. He had a habit of repeating his sentences, in order to make them more emphatic. "I intend to surprise her, and that's how I came to get lost. It beats me how any one can get their bearings in such a tangle of streets and houses."

"Now you're our grandpa, we must be very good to you," said Dan, leading the way to the front parlor, and offering the "new grandfather" the easiest chair.

"Children, what are you doing?" exclaimed Mrs. Dimple, as she suddenly opened the outer door and entered the hall. "Haven't I forbidden you children to go in the parlor when I am away?"

"Yes'm," said Daisy, meekly; "but we've adopted a grandfather, and—"

"Adopted a grandfather!" interrupted Mrs. Dimple, in horrified tones, as she stepped quickly to the parlor door, expecting to see some tramp helping himself to the parlor ornaments; but a familiar form arose from the great easy chair, and a familiar voice addressed her.

"I'm right down glad to see you, Sarah. Such a time as I had to find you, and may be I'd 'a been hunting for you now if these blessed children hadn't known me. It's remarkable, Sarah, remarkable what memories they must have! They never saw me but once, and they could not have been more than eight months old then."

"Uncle Daniel, this is a surprise!" exclaimed Mrs. Dimple, in delight. "But surely the children did not know you?"

"Yes they did," replied Uncle Daniel, firmly.

And no power of argument could shake his belief in "those children's remarkable memories," and if they had not really found and adopted a grandfather, they had certainly discovered a very nice old uncle, which both Daisy and Dannie declared was "most as good as a truly grandfather."—Rose Hartwick Thorpe, in Golden Days.

A HEBREW CUSTOM.

How Orthodox Jews Cherish the Memory of Their Dead.

In the home of one of our Jewish citizens was seen recently a tiny flame burning in a handsome goblet. Examination showed the goblet half filled with water, on the top of which floated an inch of sweet oil. On the ring was placed a wax taper, hardly thicker than a thread, passed through a small circle of thin wood, so that the lower end of the taper dipped through the ring into the sweet oil. The upper end was lighted. The sweet oil drawn up through the wax-covered wick served to keep it alight for several hours.

"We burn this," said a rabbi, "in memory of one of our dead. When that taper burns nearly out we substitute another, so that the flame, like the vestal fire, is never allowed to go out. We light the taper when our relative dies and let it burn a year. The last taper we let go out of itself. It flickers, flames up, sinks, flares again and then goes out, just as human life does in its last hours. We tend this light with great care, and thus keep alive in the memory of our loved one. It is an old custom which is now becoming less observed. Many now only burn the taper for a month and some but for a week."—N. Y. Sun.

—"How bright the heavenly stars are to-night, Mr. Sampson." "Ah, yes, Miss Smith; but they are dim and lusterless compared with certain earthly ones," he said, looking into her eyes. "And the wind," she went on, "how soft and low, as it gently moves the chestnut trees."—Chicago Tribune.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—A tight roof on the shed, a clean fleece on the sheep.

—Experiments show that it pays to grind the cob with the grains of corn, as it possesses nutritive qualities.

—If your land is well underdrained you will often be able to plow while your neighbor who may not have underdrained is waiting for his ground to dry off before he can begin.

—It is not safe to apply unleached wood ashes around the base of very young trees. Ashes give better results when spread broadcast over the surface of the ground around the trees. Cases are known in which young peach trees have been injured by the application of wood ashes thickly around and close to the trunks.

—Many swine breeders regard a solid earth floor the best for a pig pen. It must be high enough to be readily drained, so as to be dry at all times. It is also customary with some breeders to remove from six to eight inches of these earth floors every spring, drawing the manure-soaked earth on to the fields and renewing the floors with fresh earth.

—Marrow Balls: Soak beef marrow over night in cold water. Take one-third cup of marrow and rub to a cream. Add two or three rolled crackers (according to size.) Add one-half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of chopped parsley and a very little nutmeg or mace, one egg, yelk and white beaten separately. Roll in balls. Cook in the soup five or ten minutes.

—It is desirable to have a clean soil with growing crops, but if no crops be growing it would be better to have weeds grow to be plowed in than to have nothing; weeds of themselves do not do the harm, but with growing crops, or when allowed to seed. If plowed in green they will return to the soil all that has been abstracted from it, and, in addition, all that has been drawn from the atmosphere.

—A very pretty and useful catch-all may be made of four pieces of cretonne, say about eighteen inches long and six inches wide; cut each piece in a point about six inches from the bottom; sew together, putting a tassel at the point; face the top on the inside with a color of tassel below; stitch two rows around an inch below the top far enough apart to insert a piece of skirt springs, or narrow hoop enough smaller in circumference to allow a little fullness; suspend with cord and tassels, and rest assured it will soon merit its name, being a receptacle for every article imaginable.

BEES FOR BEGINNERS.

Advice to a Farmer's Widow Who Desires to Engage in Agriculture.

If you have a liking for out-door pursuits, with a fixed determination to succeed, and are not afraid of bees, in time you might make a living. Do not purchase more than two colonies to start with; if you can manage these successfully, you will have in the fall (provided it is a good season) four good strong colonies and between four and five hundred pounds of honey. If you succeed, your knowledge must increase in the same ratio as your bees. You must also expect reverses, like the past season, which has been one, with few exceptions, of entire failure all over this continent. I met a lady at one of the conventions who had read that charming fiction, "Blessed Bees," and caught the bee-fever so badly, that she invested $600 at once. She later wrote: "All that I have for this investment, is hives full of foundation, with a queen and a handful of bees running over it." Now if you do not wish to buy your experience dearly, as this lady did, commence at the bottom and go up.

As you have lived on a farm, you probably know how to raise chickens, and might keep them while you are building up an apiary. When you have a large apiary, you will have no time for them, unless you manage somewhat in this way. Set the hens in February, so the pullets will be old enough to lay in the fall, and sell off all the old hens and cockerels in the spring. It will be little work to feed the pullets during warm weather, and if you have good, warm quarters for them, and give them the right kind of food, you will have eggs to sell all winter, when they bring a good price. A German who lives across the alley from me has a hen house almost all under ground, and the chickens lay all winter. Managing in this way, the busy season with bees would be in warm weather, and that of the fowls in cold weather.

The surest places for honey are along water courses, and where there are overflowed lands, but I think it would be best for you to follow Longfellow and "take whatever lieth near you, and work from it thy work of art." Remember the story of the old lark and her young ones, and stay where you can look after your property yourself. If possible rent a place surrounded with shrubbery and low trees like May cherries Where an apiary is located near large forest trees, swarms sometimes cluster very high, and it is very difficult to hive them. If the place is small, very near neighbors are not desirable, as bees are a kind of stock not always to be controlled, and are dangerous near horses. Avoid locating near a public square, or blacksmith's shop. I know of a town where the business is very much injured by an apiary located at a public square, where there are wells, drinking troughs and hitching posts for teams. Several accidents have occurred here, as a horse, when once stung, becomes almost frantic when he hears a bee hum, and farmers drive off to other towns in place of coming here for fear of the bees.—Prairie Farmer.

NEURALGIA.

Nerves.—Everyone of the thread-like nerves has each a latent power to cause excruciating pain, the limit of which is simply the limit of human endurance, and NEURALGIA has a few of these fibrous torments all pulsing painfully at once.

CHARACTERISTICS.

Subtile Pain.—Nothing is so subtile in its approach; nothing so flagrant, acute and distressing, and certainly nothing yet discovered so completely subdues its ravages and so permanently conquers its pangs as that above mentioned.

SYMPTOMS.

Symptoms.—Neuralgia is defined to be a nerve disease, the chief symptom of which is an acute pain, intermitting, which follows the course of the nerve branch affected.

TREATMENT.

Treatment.—Apply ST. JACOBS OIL frequently, gently rubbing the afflicted parts; apply to the whole extent of the nerve soreness; keep up a gentle friction until a burning sensation is produced.

ARE YOU SICK?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the variety and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in, and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

BILIOUS ATTACK. DAVID G. LOWE, Esq., of St. Agathe, Manitoba, Canada, says: "Being troubled with a terrible bilious attack, fluttering of the heart, poor rest at night, etc., I commenced the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' and derived the very highest benefit therefrom."

LIVER DISEASE. Mrs. I. V. WEBBER, of Yorkshire, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., writes: "For five years previous to taking 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' I was a great sufferer; had a severe pain in my right side continually; was unable to do my own work. I am now well and strong."

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse the blood, which is the fountain of health, by using DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, and bodily health and vigor will be established.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures all humors, from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood, are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Virulent blood-poisons are, by its use, robbed of their terrors. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-Joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

A medicine possessing the power to cure such inveterate blood and skin diseases as the following testimonial portrays, must certainly be credited with possessing properties capable of curing any and all skin and blood diseases, for none are more obstinate or difficult of cure than Salt-rheum.

SALT-RHEUM AND RHEUMATISM. "COLUMBUS, OHIO, Aug. 18th, 1887. WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.: Gentlemen—For several years I have felt it to be my duty to give to you the facts in relation to the complete cure of a most aggravated case of salt-rheum, by the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' An elderly lady relative of mine had been a great sufferer from salt-rheum for upwards of forty years. The disease was most distressing in her hands, causing the skin to crack open on the inside of the fingers at the joints and between the fingers. She was obliged to protect the raw places by means of adhesive plasters, salves, ointments and bandages, and during the winter months had to have her hands dressed daily. The pain was quite severe at times and her general health was badly affected, paving the way for other diseases to creep in. Catarrh and rheumatism caused a great deal of suffering in addition to the salt-rheum. She had used faithfully, and with the most commendable perseverance, all the remedies prescribed by her physicians, but without obtaining relief. She afterwards began treating herself by drinking teas made from blood-purifying roots and herbs. She continued this for several years but derived no benefit. Finally, about ten years ago, I chanced to read one of Dr. Pierce's small pamphlets setting forth the merits of his 'Golden Medical Discovery' and other medicines. The name struck my fancy, and seeing that it was essentially a blood-purifier, I immediately recommended it to the old lady who had been so long a sufferer from salt-rheum. She commenced taking it at once, and took one bottle, but seemed to be no better. However, I realized that it would take time for any medicine to effect a change for the better, and encouraged her to continue. She then purchased a half-a-dozen bottles, and before these had all been used she began to notice an improvement. After taking about a dozen bottles she was entirely cured. Her hands were perfectly well and as smooth and healthy as a child's. Her general health was also greatly improved; the rheumatism entirely left her, and the catarrh was almost cured, so that it ceased to be much annoyance. She has enjoyed excellent health from that day to this, and has had no return of either salt-rheum or rheumatism. The 'Discovery' seems to have entirely eradicated the salt-rheum from her system. She is now over eighty years old, and very healthy for one of such extreme age.

I have written this letter, of which you can make any use you see fit, hoping that some sufferer from salt-rheum might chance to read it and obtain relief by using your 'Golden Medical Discovery'—for 'Golden' it is in its curative properties, and as much above the multitude of nostrums and so-called 'patent medicines,' so jealously flaunted before the public, as gold is above the baser metals.

Respectfully yours,
F. W. WHEELER, 182 21st St."

CONSUMPTION, WEAK LUNGS, SPITTING OF BLOOD.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures Consumption (which is Scrofula of the Lungs), by its wonderful blood-purifying, invigorating and nutritive properties. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Bronchitis, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Severe Coughs, Asthma, and kindred affections, it is a sovereign remedy. While it promptly cures the severest Coughs, it strengthens the system and purifies the blood.

CONSUMPTION. SOLOMON BUTTS, of North Clayton, Miami Co., Ohio, writes: "I have not the words to express my gratitude for the good your 'Golden Medical Discovery' has done my wife. She was taken with consumption, and after trying one doctor after another I finally gave up all hope of relief. Being very poor and having but one dollar in the world, I prayed to God that he might show me something; and then it seems as though something did tell me to get your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' My wife took it as directed, and as a result she is so she can work now."

GAINED 25 POUNDS. Wasting Disease.—WATSON F. CLARKE, Esq., of (Box 104, Summerside, Prince Edward Island, Can., writes: "When I commenced taking your 'Golden Medical Discovery,' I was not able to work and was a burden to myself. At that time I weighed 122 pounds, and to-day I weigh 147 pounds. Then I used to eat about one meal a day, and now can eat four or five if I dared to."

COUGH OF FIVE YEARS' STANDING. Mrs. N. W. RICE, of Newfane, Vermont, says: "I feel at liberty to acknowledge the benefit I received from two bottles of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' which cured a cough of five years' standing, and dyspepsia, from which I had suffered for a long time. I have also used Dr. Pierce's Extract of Smart-Weed, or Water Pepper, in my family, with good effect."

WORTH $1000 A BOTTLE. W. R. DAVIS, Esq., of Bellville, Florida, writes: "I have taken your wonderful 'Golden Medical Discovery' and have been cured of consumption. I am now sound and well, and have only spent three dollars, and I would not take three thousand dollars and be put back where I was."

Discovery $1.00, Six Bottles for $5.00; by Druggists.

Legislative Notes.

There has been but little local legislation for this county since our last issue. A few bills, already noted, have been advanced but no new ones introduced.

Mr. Friend's bill to prohibit hunting and fishing in this county by non-residents of the State, met with decided opposition here, and a strong protest against its passage was sent down Monday. We understand that Mr. Friend will so amend the bill as to exclude Districts 7, 8, and 10 from its provisions.

The bill providing for the appointment of a treasurer for Calvert county came up for a second reading. It proposed to have the treasurer appointed by the Governor. The bill was amended so as to have the treasurer elected by the people.

The House Judiciary Committee have instructed their chairman by a unanimous vote to report favorably the bill to strike out the word "white" from the bastardy law.

The joint committee on elections sat until midnight of Monday, and they will meet every night this week to complete the new election law. Its features have already been published. The Governor is to appoint election commissioners for Baltimore city and the counties. In the city these commissioners will appoint boards of registers for each ward, and in the counties one register for each election district. They shall also appoint the judges and clerks of election, and serve as canvassers of the vote. A new registration is to be had in 1889, and every four years thereafter in the city and every ten years in the counties, with annual supplementary registration.

Vicious Legislation

We observe that there is a bill for Garrett county to take the appointment of County Treasurer or Collector from the County Commissioners and give it to the Governor. Can there be anything worse than legislation of this kind? It is a precedent for all kinds of narrow and dangerous legislation. If the people of a county should change their Commissioners, and for the best of reasons, at once application is to be made to the Legislature for a law divesting the Board of all appointing power and conferring it upon the Governor. Here is a violation of the home rule principle that no one, and especially a Democrat, should for a moment entertain or justify. The transference of so exclusive a county appointment as this to the Governor, who, not residing there, cannot be expected to know the people of the county, and must in the appointment be more or less directed by a few, or it may be by a coterie of intrigueing politicians, and who it may be in this instance, are engaged in getting this change so as to put some favorite in place.

So, also, is there a like bill to take from the Judges their present power of appointment of School Commissioners for the county and give this appointment to the Governor. There is no doubt but that this movement is inspired by some persons not satisfied with some appointments made by the School Commissioners, and who in such a change may get the chance of putting themselves or favorites in place.

The Governor, of course, cannot be expected to know personally the gentlemen recommended for these places and must, more or less, depend upon the few who may be interested in these appointments. The whole tendency of these changes is the concentration of power and patronage in the hands of one man. Then it is expected by the persons engineering these changes that the appointments will be made to suit them. It is said that these are local matters that should be controlled by the local delegates. But not so—these are changes affecting an entire system. If these changes are needful for one county, why not for all the counties? and hence have a general change. We have general systems for the collection of taxes and for the government of schools, and these local changes should not be allowed to interrupt the systems.

If it is a wrong system for the Judges to appoint School Commissioners, change the system. We believe ourselves that it is not the right system; but do not have these partial changes, and especially when sought to put either political or personal favorites in place. There is neither principle, sentiment, wisdom or policy in any such legislation.

In respect to the school system for counties, we think that the election of School Commissioners for each county upon the cumulative system of voting would be the wise policy.—Hagerstown Mail, Democrat.

Come up to the Scratch.

If it is not impossibible to impress upon the present Legislature the necessity of dealing with questions of great dublic importance from a public standpoint rather than in the interest of private individuals or political schemers and bosses, it will aid very materially to the sense of security the people are entitled to feel in the law-making body of the State. Not only are they entitled, in a general sense, to have the best and most conscientious service of those who have been chosen to represent them at Annapolis, but in a special sense in the case of the Legislature now in session, for the reason that it was elected under the solemn pledge of the dominant party that it would formulate into laws the reforms confessedly needed. We do not, of course, mean to say that these duties and pledges will in the end be disregarded, but it is painfully apparent that up to this time, at least, legislation is haulting in its tracks, and so far as it has moved at all, moved by no means surely. Take, for example, the bill so recently rushed through the Senate extending the terms of our mayor and city council, and now recalled from the House for further consideration. It was manifest from the beginning that in its present shape it is an ill-advised measure, effecting such a radical change that it is impossible to suppose that it is intended to promote the public good exclusively. * * * *

Again, the election law, which, more than any other measure, is hedged about with promises, drags its slow length along, until it is openly charged that those who shape so much of our legislation are devising means to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to our hopes. The main feature of the bills now pending are substantially the same, and ought to be enacted into a law. Why hesitate in order to gain some party advantage in a law ostensibly intended to promote fair play? The purpose in view ought to be to secure a fair registration and election, and not to give to the party in power an undue advantage over the minority. This is not what the party promised when it sued for votes in the last campaign, and whether it suits the aspirations of certain politicians or not, the people are honest enough to demand that the pledges be redeemed in fullness and good faith. Nor do the affairs of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal seem to be progressing as satisfactorily as the public would like. It is a singular fact that the aid proposed to be extended by those who ought to be best informed upon the subject is just such as the constitution prohibits, while the solution of the problem, which violates no constitutional obligation, is not supposed to be received with favor. We have devoted some space heretofore to the discussion of the constitutional question, and our conclusion has been that the State can neither buy the unproductive bonds of the canal for its sinking fund nor advance the money to pay interest upon them. * * * But whatever is done for the relief of our canal let it be done with some regard to the best interests of the State, and not to prolong a burden upon the public, simply because it is thought to be necessary to the success of the party in power that places shall be supplied at the public expense for its hangers-on and dependents. The Democratic party needs no such bolstering up in this State. Its worst enemies to-day are in its own ranks, and are the very men who are seeking to strengthen its machinery at the cost of public confidence. It can readily take care of itself if honestly dealt with, but if legislation is to be manipulated to keep it in power, and the State treasury sapped to reward its henchmen, it will find when its day of trial again comes that its misdeeds will be remembered and its promises laughed to scorn.—Baltimore Sun.

Mr. Blaine will not Allow the use of His Name as a Candidate.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Feb. 12.—The Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette will publish the following to-morrow:

Mr. B. F. Jones, Chairman of the National Republican Committee has received a letter from Mr. Blaine declining to allow his name to be presented to the National Republican Convention as a candidate for the Presidential nomination.

Mr. Jones when asked whether Mr. Blaine's declination would prevent his friends from nominating him anyhow, said: "As I am Charman of the National Committee, I do not think it would be proper for me to have anything to say on that subject."

"Do you think Mr. Blaine would accept the nomination if tendered to him?"

"I have no authority to speak for Mr. Blaine and have no conjectures to offer on the subject. The latter speaks for itself and I must decline to be interviewed on this question."

BLAINE'S ULTIMATUM.

FLORENCE, ITALY, Jan. 28, 1888.

B. F. Jones, Esq., Chairman of the Republican National Committee:

SIR.—I wish through you to state to the members of the Republican party that my name will not be presented to the National Convention called to assemble in Chicago in June next for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States. I am constrained to this decision by considerations entirely personal to myself, of which you were advised more than a year ago. But I cannot make the announcement without giving expression to my deep sense of gratitude to the many thousands of my countrymen who have sustained me so long and so cordially that their feeling has seemed to go beyond the ordinary political adherence of fellow partisans and to partake somewhat of the nature of personal attachment. For this most generous loyalty of friendship I can make no adequate return, but I shall carry the memory of it while life lasts. Nor can I refrain from congratulating the Republican party upon the cheering prospects which distinguish the opening of the National contest of 1888, as compared with that of 1884.

In 1882 the Republican party throughout the Union met with a disastrous defeat. Ten States that had supported Garfield and Arthur in the election of 1880 were carried by the Democrats either by majorities or plurslities. The Republican loss in the Northern elections, compared with the preceding National election, exceeded half a million votes, and the electoral votes of the Union, divided on the basis of the result of 1882, gave the Democrats over three hundred electors out of a total of four hundred and one. There was a partial reaction in favor of the Republicans in the elections of 1883, but the Democrats still held possession of seven Northern States, and on the basis of the year's contest could show more than one hundred majority in the electoral colleges of the whole country. But against the discouragement naturally following the adverse elections of these two years the spirit of the Republican party in the National contest of 1884 rose high, and the Republican masses entered into the campaign with such energy that the final result depended on the vote of a single state, and that state was carried by the Democratic party by a plurality so small that it represented less than one-eleventh of one per cent. of the entire vote. The change in a single vote of every (2,000) two thousand of the total poll would have given the State to the Republicans, though only two years before, the Democratic plurality exceeded (192,000) one hundred and ninety-two thousand. The elections of 1886 and 1887 have demonstrated growing strength in the Republican ranks. Seldom in our political history has a party, defeated in a National election, rallied immediately with such vigor, as have the Republicans since 1884.

No comparison is possible between the spirit of the party in 1882-3 and its spirit in 1887. The two periods present simply a contrast, the one of general depression, the other of enthusiastic revival. Should the party gain, in the results of 1888, over those of 1886-87, in anything like the proportion of the gain of 1884 over 1882-3 it would secure one of the most remarkable victories of its entire existence. But victory does not depend on so large a ratio of increase; the party has only to maintain relatively its presstige of 1886-7 to give its National candidate every Northern State but one, with a far better prospect of carrying that one than it has had for the past six years.

Another feature of the political situation should inspire Republicans with irresistable strength. The present National administration was elected with, if not upon, the repeated assertions of its leading supporters in every protection State that no issue on the tariff was involved. However earnestly Republicans urged that question as the one of controlling importance in the campaign, they were met by the Democratic leaders and journals with persistent evasion, concealment and denial. That resource the President has fortunately removed. The issue which the Republicans maintained and the Democrats avoided in 1884 has been prominently and specifically brought forward by the Democratic President, and cannot be hidden out of sight in 1888.

The country is now in the enjoyment of an industrial system which in a quarter of a century has assured a larger national growth, a more rapid accumulation and broader distribution of wealth than were ever before known to history. The American people will now be openly and formally asked to decide whether this system shall be recklessly abandoned and a new trial be made of an old experiment which has uniformly led to national embrarassment and widespread individual distress. On the result of such an issue, fairly presented to the popular judgment, there is no room for doubt. One thing only is necessary to assure success—complete harmony and cordial co-operation on the part of both of those who aspire to lend and of those who are eager to follow.

The duty is not one merely of honorable devotion to the party whose record and whose aims are alike great, but it is one demanded by the instinct of self interest and by the still higher promptings of patriotism. A closer observation of the conditions of life among the older nations gives a more intense desire that the American people shall make no mistake in choosing the policy which inspires labor with hope and crowns it with dignity, which gives safety to capital and protects its increase, which secures political power to every citizen, comfort and culture to every home. To this end, not less earnestly and more directly as a private citizen than as a public candidate, I shall devote myself, with the confident belief that the administration of the Government will be restored to the party which has demonstrated the purpose and the power to wield it for the unity and the honor of the Republic, for the prosperity and progress of the people.

I am, very sincerely yours,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Press Opinions.

NEW YORK, Feb. 13.—The Times says: "A variety of circumstances conspire to throw a visible shade of doubt over Mr. Blaine's actual meaning. But after all the striking feature in the present political situation is the extraordinary activity of the Republican clubs all over the country. These clubs are Blaine clubs, the men who have organized and who control them are Blaine men, and it is from Blaine centres that the influences have gone forth and are still going forth to build up these clubs and prepare them for effective work at Chicago in June and during the campaign. This conspicuous political fact belies the words which Mr. Blaine writes from Florence, and makes his letter almost rediculous. A machine of such unusual proportions so carefully elaborated and put together, has not been set up on the mere chance that Mr. Blaine would be a candidate, or might be persuaded to be, and it will not be taken apart or turned over to the service of any of Mr. Blaine's rivals merely because Mr. Blaine has written a letter to Chairman Jones stating that his name will not be presented to the nominating convention. The Blaine agitation will go on as merrily as ever, in spite of this rather ambiguous disclaimer of presidential aspirations on the part of Mr. Blaine. And if, when the Chicago convention adjourns, Mr. Blaine shall discover that he is the nominee, nothing will be easier than for him to write another letter to Mr. Jones, or to Mr. Jones's successor, explaining that when he was in Florence he really did not understand the weight and poteney and irresistible character of the popular demand for James G. Blaine."

The Herald says: "We part from Mr. Blaine on his withdrawal from public affairs. The Republican party has many leaders ready for the campaign. New England has presented Hawley, with a strong following, and the advantage of a meritorious civil and military career. In new York we have Evarts and a score of statesmen.

"The West will send many candidates with John Sherman easily in the lead, and unless the enthusiasm aroused by the name and glory of Sheridan should disturb Republican political calculations, John Sherman will probably take the place as Republican leader which Mr. Blaine surrenders."

The Tribune says: "This letter is no surprise to the friends of Mr. Blaine who have known how reluctant he has been from the outset to give the sanction even of silence to such consideration. It is the simple fact that Mr. Blaine was almost dragooned by his friends into the candidacies of 1880 and 1884, and that he has constantly assured them that he would not be put into the position of even seeming to seek a renomination again. It has long been evident that nothing but his own positive action could prevent a renomination this year, and so he has finally felt forced to say to the public what he has been saying in private. We regret the dicision profoundly, since we have believed that he would command more votes in the doubtful States than any other Republican yet proposed. But various candidates, all excellent men, and deserving well of the Republican party, are actively in the field, and the next few weeks may be expected to present some unusually lively politics, and may the best man win."

Organizing Republican Clubs.

To the Republicans of Maryland:

In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution adopted by the Republican League of the United States, at its Convention held in New York, City, December 16th, 1887, a call is hereby respectfully issued to the Republican voters of the various cities and counties of the State, earnestly urging immediate organization of permanent Clubs in every ward in cities, and in every County District, if dossible, in the State, with a view to establish a Maryland Republican League; the State League to be made up by delegates from the various Local Republican Clubs within the State.

The object in forming Club organization and a Republican League in our State, is to maintain Republican principles, to secure unity of action and effective work, and promote, by all legitimate agencies, the success of the Republican party and its candidates,

In the formation of the Clubs the following is respectfully suggested, and thereby we can hope to exact a potent influence among the masses and strengthen the Republican party:

1st. Do not name your Club after any State ar local leader.

2nd. Do not allow your Club to be used to further the interest of any candidate for office previous to nomination, or to gratify the individual desire of any candidate to represent your City, County, or District Republican Convention, but reserve all your force to be exerted in behalf of all candidates nominated by Republican Conventions.

3d. Let it be especially impressed upon the Republican masses in the Wards and Counties that Club Organizations do not intend to interfere in any manner with State City or County political committees. Our purpose is simply to organize that sentiment which favors a fair protection to Home industries and American Labor, and to engage heart and soul in an earnest contest to help elect the Republican President and Vice-Prisident named by the Chicago Nominating Convention.

4th. As to your membership admit any male person over eighteen years of age, who is a Republican and in hearty sympathy with the principles of the Republican party, and gives his word of honor that he will support its candidates.

5th. The officers of your Club should be a President, three Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of five, of which the President and Secretary should be ex-officio members. All officers to be members of the Club.

6th. After a meeting of members of not less than ten present, submit a Constitution for your guidance. The name and regular meeting of your Club and time and place of meeting, and after the adoption of your Constitution by a membership of not less than twenty members, elect at least three, and not more than five to represent your Club in a Republican State League Convention, for the purpose of encouragement and enrollment of permanent Republican Clubs, and to establish a full co-operation with the regular Republican Committees of the State, each Club will have only one vote in the Councils of the State League.

It is earnestly desired by the member of the Executive Committee and the Vice-President for Maryland National League, that every Republican in the State will give this work his hearty support, and before our party selects its representatives to the Republican National Nominating Convention, we will be in a condition to organize our State League upon the plan adopted by the National Convention of Republican Clubs, and be fully prepared through Club Organization to aid and assist the regular committees of our State in the distribution of sound political knowledge, so that the voter shall not only be informed, but have opinions and convictions of his own, and that the present and future issues shall guide his ballot in expressing his choice of candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States, and not the skeleton of the dead political past.

It is further suggested that upon the organization of a Club, the President or Secretary thereof at once give notice of the fact to W. W. Johnson, Executive Member for Maryland National League, 23 W. Saratoga street, Baltimore, Md.," (and where Clubs are already existing they are requested to meet and elect delegates to the League Convention,) giving name of the Club, the number of members, the names of the officers and the names of the delegates chosen to attend the Convention to form a State League, and the City, Ward, County and District in which the organization has been effected; this will enable the proper formation of a roll for the meeting of the State League.

Let us work together and we will have an enthusiastic gathering of the Republicans of Maryland in Convention, assembled not later than the 20th of April, 1888.

W. W. JOHNSON,
For Maryland National League.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12th, 1888.—Democratic Congressmen have a very convenient habit of laying aside temporarily their pet hobby, "retrenchment and economy" whenever their own comfort is in any manner at stake. Two entirely new committees have been made by the Democratic House, one on Indian Depredations, and the other on the Eleventh Census, of which those two shining lights of Democracy, Mr. Whitthorse, of Tennessee, and "Sunset" Cox, of New York, are respectively the chairman. As it was eminently necessary—in the eyes of these gentlemen—to have separate rooms for these committees to meet in, they have persuaded a majority of the House Committee on Accounts to recommend that two rooms be rented for them, in the large stone building opposite the Capitol known as the Butler mansion, at a rental of $100 per month, and that the Clerk of the House shall furnish the same. This is a sheer waste of money. It is not at all likely that either one of these committees will be in actual session for ten hours during the entire session. The rooms will simply be elegantly furnished, private offices for the chairmen of the committees and their friends. In order to save that $100 a month, one or two postal employes will have to be discharged.

For making the best out of a bad situation, the average Democratic official beats the world. Speaker Carlisle allowed the corridors of the House to be occupied by the private officers of several New York stock brokers during the entire session, until an enterprising correspondent showed the thing up, then he at first denied their existence, then made them get out, and now he and particularly his friends for him, want to claim credit for bringing about a great reform by abolishing these places, that never existed before he was Speaker. How's that for Democratic cheek?

A leather medal sheuld be at once awarded Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, (Democrat of course) for the able manner in which he stood up in the House for the inefficient mail service the administration is giving the country just now. Postmaster General Dickinson should see to it that he has a postoffice named after him at once.

The Cleveland and anti-Cleveland Democrats will probably have their first real fight right here in Washington. Although the citizens of the District of Columbia are not allowed to vote for President or Vice-President after they are nominated, both of the great political parties, allow them two delegates in the national nominating conventions. It is over the election of these two delegates that the fight is going to take place. In fact it has already begun. Of course Cleveland expects the friends of his local Federal appointees to see that Cleveland men are selected; but it will not be by any means an easy task, as Cleveland is probably more thoroughly disliked by Democrats in this District than anywhere else in the country.

The we're-here-to-stay expression which was worn by Democratic officials in the early days of the administration, has been superseded by a frightened can-we-carry-New York look. They are losing confidence every day, while Republicans are gaining it. This is the direct result of the unbusiness like policy of the administration, which has made the Democratic party thousands of enemies whose votes will for the first time be cast for the Republican party this fall.

It is daily becoming plainer that as long as the House is controlled by the Solid South, no new states, no matter how large they may be, are to be admitted to the Union for fear they may be Republican. These same Southern Democrats tried for years to break up the Union and ignominiously failed, but the thought of the vast power they wield under the present administration, serves as a mitigation to a great extent, of that failure. They are now accomplishing, by means of suppressed votes, what they lost by fighting.

SHEALTIEL LODGE, No. 122, I. O. O. F., meets in Legge's Hall every Monday night.

PATMOS COUNCIL, No. 386, A. L. of H., meets in same Hall 1st and 2d Thursday nights of each month.

The Y. M. C. A. of Oakland meets in the Pritchard Building Friday night of each week

—An infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Shartzer died at their home near Oakland last Saturday.

—Patmos Council 386, A. L. of H., was visited Thursday night of last week by the Grand Officers of Maryland.

—Mrs. Annie McDevitt, late of Arkansas City, Kansas, an older sister of Mrs. J. B. Fay, of this place, and who had been an invalid for several years, died on Saturday night last, at Emmittsburg, Md.

—we would call special attention to the advertisement in this issue, of Hoopes, Bro. & Thomas, the well-known Nurserymen of West Chester, Pa., who are in want of a few more salesmen to sell their specialties in Nursery stock.

—Mrrried, at the residence of the bride's parents, Jan. 31st, 1888, by Rev. Joseph B. Feather, Mr. Wm. A. J. Broadwater, of Garrett county, Md., and Miss Tempie E. Harshbarger, of Barbour county, W. Va.

—Senator Browning and Mr. Peddicord came up from Annapolis Saturday and returned Monday. They were accompanied on their return by Messrs. P. and G. S. Hamill and D. E. Offutt. Dr. E. H. Bartlett and Mr. C. M. Milier also went down Tuesday night.

—Mr. Isaac G. Michael, of District No. 4, this county, a graduate of Western Maryland College, will open a select school in the public school building, Oakland, immediately after the close of the present term of the public school. Previous to the opening Mr. Michael will call upon the patrons of the school and make known his terms.

—We learn from a letter written by Miss Lillie Brown, bearing date of Feb. 5th, who taught select and public school in our town and county for a number of years, and is now teaching in Pasadena, California, to Mrs. J. A. Grant here, that out of the 107 days she has been in California it has only rained four days and nights, besides two other days that it was disagreeable to be out. She says the ground that was covered with sand when she arrived in Pasadena is now covered with a verdure of beautiful green as far as the eye can see, and the orange trees are bending with fruit, and strawberries are in perfection. The thermometer has ranged from 70 to 90 degrees in the shade, the lowest being 38 degrees above zero, and that for a few mornings only, and no frost to injure the most delicate fruits.

Gen. Kelley Dying.

A special Washington dispatch to the Wheeling Intelligencer, dated Feb. 14th, says that General B. F. Kelley is gradually sinking. Colonel Hawkes, formerly on Kelley's staff, called on him to-day and found him very weak. He says he cannot last long. The General is at the Buckingham Hotel with his wife.

Mid-Winter Announcement.

I take pleasure in announcing to all my customers and the public in general that I have recently replenished my stock of Confectioneries, &c., which their liberal patronage during the holidays had well nigh exhausted, and am now prepared to greet them with a full and fresh lot of Confectionaries, Oranges, Lemons, Raisins, Cocoanuts, Cigars, Tobaccos, Cakes, Crackers, Nuts, &c., &c. Oysters in bulk, or stewed or fried in first-class style, always on hand at reasonable prices. Having made the necessary arrangements, I can furnish on short notice all kinds of Periodicals and Books, Sheet Music, Music Books and Musical Instruments. Give me a call before going elsewhere for anything in my line.

Respectfully,

1 21 J. M. LITZINGER.

Prominent Lumberman Killed.

Mr. M. E. Howe, a prominent lumber dealer, residing at Mt. Lake Park, was killed Wednesday night, by being run over by a "helper," between Tunnelton and Rowlesburg. Mr. Howe was about forty years of age, and leaves a wife and three children.

Child Killed.

The eight year old boy of Mr. Francis Pritts, residing about four miles from Swanton, this county, was killed Friday evening of last week, by being struck on the head by a cross tie thrown from the shoulder of the father, who did not know that the child was near. Death was instantaneous.

Card of Thanks.

FRIENDSVILLE, Md., Feb. 13. 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—Please allow us through the columns of your paper to return our sincers thanks to the brethren, sisters and friends of Johnstown for the very liberal donation received from them last Friday evening. We especially enjoyed the visit of those (32 in number) who conveyed the gifts to us, also the excellent music rendered by Bro. Bishoff and his choir.

Yours in Christian Love,

A. S. ARNETT,
H. A. ARNETT.

The Covention at Wheeling.

The passenger department of the B. & O. R. R. announce that arrangements have been made to sell Excursion tickets to Wheeling and return at single fare for the round trip, from all stations on its lines between Harpers Ferry and Parkersburg, Grafton and Benwood, and Morgantown and Fairmont, on account of the Immigration Convention to be held at Wheeling on the 29th inst.

The tickets will be sold for all trains, February 28th and 29th, and valid for return passage until March 2nd, 1888.

Serenades.

The Oakland Brass Band Monday night serenaded two newly wedded couples—Mr. John Yellowly and wife (nee Gussie Rinehart,) who were married Sunday, and Mr. Frank M. Robbins and wife (nee Hattie M. Naylor,) of Hedgesville, W. Va., who are spending their honeymoon here with the bride's brother, Mr. A. D. Naylor. The members of the band were handsomely entertained at both places.

Notice.

All persons knowing themselves indebted to John Shartzer are hereby notified to call and settle by cash, note or produce, on or before March 1st, 1888, as all open accounts after that day will be put in shape of judgments. This may seem somewhat harsh, but remember an open account will be of no good to me after I go West. Everybody is able to give their note. No produce taken on old accounts after the above date.

Senator Sherman's motto is a good one: "A free ballot and a fair count, unless secured to the whole country, the constitution is set at naught, the suffrage imparied, and the republic imperilled"—and might with profit be adopted by the entire Republican party, and if there be any member of the party who objects, let him go where he belongs—to the Democrats,

The Model Sunday School Superintendent.

The following essay was read by Rev. J. M. Davis at the M. E. Quarterly Conference at Johnstown last fall. As a number of requests have been made for its publication, we take pleasure in laying it before our readers:

The subject given me for discussion is one of vital importance. A model is a sample to be imitated. If the pattern be defective the mechanic cannot construct a machine that will be perfect in all its parts, or do work as the inventor designed, hence the model should be thoroughly tested before used as a pattern by the builder. A Model Sunday School Superintendent, or one who is a perfect pattern would be difficult or impossible to find. Yet there are those who are efficient workers who, by years of experience, careful preparation and successful work become worthy and safe examples to follow. We would advise, however, that Sunday School workers should have the highest ideal, and imitate as far as possible the "Great Teacher of Teachers." But we cannot discard the fact that we are to a very great extent influenced by contact and association. Almost unconciously young people learn to imitate others in action, in manerism, in speaking, in gesticulation, &c. Not unfrequently is it the case that young ministers imitate their presiding elders, at least in some of the ways we have mentioned. It is not too much then to say that scholars will to some extent imitate their teachers and superintendent. But while it is true that a perfect model may not be found—one eminently successful in all departments of Sunday School work—yet it seemes to us there are certain traits of character and qualifications that must be sought by every one who would become successful in this great department of church work.

We will notice a few of the qualifications we regard as essential to the Model Sunday School Superintedent. Also negatively what he must not be.

1st. He must not be careless; he must have a time for everything and see that everything has its place and is completed within the time.

2d. He must not be a scolder or fault-finder. He should be positive and see that there is good order in the school, but this is not generally done most successfully by scolding. A man who is a grum, snarly or sarcastic is not a suitable person to fill the responsible position of Sunday School Superintendent, but on the other hand if he be gentle, affable and kind he will command respect and have the affection of the children.

3d. He must not be what we sometimes call a blabber. Many superintendents talk too much and thus interfere with the study of the lesson. Talks should always be short and to the point. They should generally be confined to the lesson. No question should be brought up and discussed that is foreign to the lesson of the day. No catch questions should be allowed, as they only result in a waste of time.

What the superintendent should be.

1st. The Sunday School Superintendent should be a religious character; not merely moral or religiously inclined, but one whose life reflects the beauty and power of the Christian religion. He should be a "bright and shining light," known and read of all men."

2d. But goodness alone will not qualify. Many mistakes are made and schools sadly injured by placing men at the head because they possess the first qualification and have no other. Many good men are failures, not only as Sunday School Superintendents, but as Class Leaders, Exhortors and Preachers. But in addition to goodness, and closely connected, the Superintendent to be successful must be studious. Man must know before he can impart. A teacher or superintendent has no more right to go to school on Sunday to teach the lesson without careful preparation than the pastor has to enter the pulpit without making the best preparation he can for his sermon. He should be correct. The superintendent is not only a teacher, but a teacher of teachers. He is expected to be able to explain the lesson and should correct any errors of inexperienced teachers. Hence if he does not understand the text or lesson thoroughly, he should by all means consult some standard authority before he gives an opinion.

3d. He must love his work and the souls of children. To insure success, he must be willing to make sacrifices for the cause and for the good of others

4th. In short, he must remember that he is teaching by precept and example. Those placed under his care are continually taking cognizance of his actions and example. He should be careful that the example is such as it would be well for young persons to follow; an example of early and regular attendance, of seriousness of deportment, earnestness of spirit, of devotedness to the work, of purity of purpose, of untiring zeal, of christian affection, of dilligent preparation. If it be possible he should be at every meeting of the School or teachers. He should lead, cheer and encourage, ever holding up to the minds of his teachers the greatness and glory of the work in which they are engaged, the object at which they should aim, and the blessed though unmerited reward which every faithful teacher shall at last receive. He should encourage the young christian teacher with tender counsel, cheering words and christian sympathy.

These, dear brethren, are some of the traits and principles which if formulated and practiced in the life will make the superintendent successful and his character worthy of imitation.

We conclude by repeating the rules we would lay down for the model Superintendent:

NEGATIVELY.

1. He must not be careless.
2. He should have business habits. Do every thing in time and at the time.
3. Should not scold or use sarcasm.
4. Should not talk too much and always on the lesson.
5. Visitors should be treated cordially and if invited to address the school should be brief and generally upon the lessen of the day.

AFFIRMATIVELY.

1. Let the Superintendent be a man of piety and settled christian principles.
2. Of intelligence, information and prudence,
3. A man of punctuality and business habits.
4. A man whose heart is thoroughly in the Sunday School work.
5. A man of tact and ready resources.
6. A man of persevereance and gentleness of spirit.

We have briefly outlined a few of the qualifications we conceive necessary to constitute a successful Sunday School Superintendent. It may be impossible to find all these qualifications concentrated in one individual, but they should be aimed at. No one should be discouraged. By earnest effort and Divine help we may be qualified. You may have more elements of success in you than you think. The latent powers that lie dormant should be brought out.

Elkins.

Mr. Jerry Browning, whose horse some weeks ago fell with him, mashing his foot and leg badly, is slowly improving.

Mr. Thomas Dayton, who had his finger broken some time since, cut his foot last week while making crossties, thus laying him up for a time again.

Mr. Joseph Shillingburg has sold his store here and will engage in business elsewhere. Mr. Charles Hilary, of Piedmont, was the purchaser. Mr. Hilary will locate in our town the first of March. He is a son-in-law of Mr. Isaac Thompson, and has been engaged in the machine shops at Piedmont. We wish him success in his new enterprise.

Rev. R. S. Welch will preach for us at 10½ A. M. Sunday, Feb. 19th.

Mr. Woodworth will preach for us Sunday night.

Mr. Jesse Hyde, who is located here as an artist, began a series of lectures the 5th inst, on "Salvation," the "Second and Third Coming of Christ." His audience the first time consisted of some eight or ten males; the second some two or three, so this time it was a failure. Mr. Hyde is a Universalist.

Mr. L. L. McCrum lost a valuable horse last week, which he had recently purchased for $180.

Mr. George W. Wilson has been having quite a serious time with his family with the measles.

Mr. W. P. Lee's family have also had the measles.

Mrs. Isaac Moreland has been seriously ill for some time, but we learn she is convalescing.

We understand the Fort Pendleton school is preparing to have an exhibition on Saturday night, March 3d, also that Mr. Gibson, of the Oak Grove school, is going to close his school with an entertainment.

We are glad to note that a greater interest is being manifested in education in this part of the county than heretofore, notwithstanding our school facilities are so shamefully limited. We, with many others, earnestly believe that "something should be done," but we are not of that number who would abolish the Public School system, neither would we destroy our elective franchise nor abridge it by having the appointees of the Governor fill many of our county offices. Surely the good people of Garrett county have an ordinary degree of common sense. Surely we are capacitated to elect our county officers and even our school commissioners,

Franklin.

Work continues very dull at the mines.

Rosa, daughter of Mr. Patrick Grant, is suffering with a bad cold.

Charles McDade is down with inflammatory rheumatism.

Thomas Garrett, of Deer Park, paid our town a visit last Saturday.

Thomas Campbell and Patrick Carney, who have started a butchering business in Piedmont, are doing very well.

John Darr has quit the mines. He is engaged with H. Rehs, of Westernport, in his pop making establishment.

The farmers are busy putting in timber to the mines during the fine sledding.

James B. McGraw was in Deer Park part of last week.

The ball to be given by the Evening Star Assembly, K. of L., of Piedmont, in the Opera House, promises to be a big affair.

ANON.

Deer Park.

The Young Girls' Christian Friendly Society will give an oyster supper at Wing and Wing, where they hold their meetings, on Thursday and Friday evenings of next week, Feb. 23d and 24th. The proceeds will be added to the funds of the Society, which is devoted to charitable purposes. There will be a table of fancy articles, and also one of home-made confectionery. All are solicited to patronize it and aid in the good work.

Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Droege returned from Baltimore yesterday. Mrs. Droege's mother, Mrs. Reinhardt, died on Saturday last at the advanced age of ninety years.

Mr. S. C. Hoye, our postmaster, has been quite ill lately but is now better.

Mr. Patrick Griffin, of our town, while jumping over a fence last Sunday, sprained his hip badly.

Rev. C. W. Maysilles is holding a protracted meeting in the Union church.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Aikin lost an infant boy last Saturday.

Mrs. C. H. Tillson is absent on a visit to her relatives in Davis, W. Va.

Col. E. C. Tillson has returned from his visit East.

Mr. B. B. Savage, the principal of our school, who has been absent on account of the illness of his father returned on Monday, leaving his father much better.

S. L. Townshend & Son

Are now located in their new store room, on Alder street, opposite Sturgiss' drug store, where they are enabled to wait upon the public, to whom they will sell as low as the lowest, the same quality of goods. Will take all kinds of produce they can handle, at the market price, in exchange for goods. They keep a full line of the celebrated Milwaukee Oil Grain Shoes, for men, women and children; also the Crusader Boots and Shoes.

A Victory for the People.

The Maryland House of Delegates at last appears to realize that its services are due to the people and not to a clique of politicians. A bill was before the House yesterday to create the office of treasurer for Calvert county, and place the power of appointment in the hands of the Governor. The committees seem to have a strange aptitude for maturing such measures, as none of general public importance have yet escaped from their hands. The Calvert bill was similar to several already passed for the purpose of disciplining counties which had voted against the ticket stamped by the impudent and unscrupulous cabal of politicians which has usurped all real power in the Democratic party. It was equivalent to saying to the people of Calvert, "You have had the audacity to question the wisdom and disobey the orders of the managers, therefore you are not fit to choose the most important officer in your county. We will choose him for you, and we have already selected a treasurer who suits us exactly."

Dorest has been thus dragooned in the past, while Garrett has been the most recent and conspicuous sufferer. But the House yesterday concluded that this petty partisan tyranny had gone far enough. An amendment was offered to the bill empowering the citizens of Calvert county to elect their own treasurer. It was vigorously opposed by the friends of the managers, and the Baltimore city delegation, with the exception of Mr. Joyce, voted solidly against the right of self-government in a county which might, as it has done before, reject the insulting dictation of the Democratic cabal.

The Republicans voted solidly to continue the right of self-government in the counties, and were joined by enough anti-ring Democrats to make their strength effective, there being forty-two votes for the amendment to allow Calvert county to elect its own treasurer, and thirty-three against it. The delegation from Baltimore county manfully upheld the rights of the counties against a usurping oligarcy, and ranged itself on the side of decent politics.

This is unquestionably the heaviest blow yet received by the managers, and may possibly put an end to their outrageous schemes, such as doubling the term of the mayor of Baltimore, depriving the people of Garrett of the right to manage their own affairs, and other projects equally pernicious, which are not yet fully developed. It is the first streak of pure azure in a terribly murky atmosphere, and gives ground for hope that a majority may yet be found with nerve to accomplish a modicum of the reforms so earnestly promised the people. — Baltimore American, Wednesday.

MORE FACT THAN FANCY.

He stayed at home, a dreamer still,
Unknown of all—with small desire
To roam beyond his native hill,
His own hearth-fire.

A common toiler, poor and plain,
No unsuspecting eye could scan
The promise ripening in the brain
Of that lone man.

His lowly life was like a cloak,
That held concealed his conscious power,
Till one bright day his genius broke
From bud to flower.

Then great men came and grasped his hand,
And praised his work, and called him wise—
And yet they could not understand
His sudden rise.

They reasoned—questioned thro' the dark—
They marvelled at his eminence;
They called his gift "a special mark
Of Providence."

He smiled—and quit their courtly hall;
He strode into the midnight murk,
And sighed: "The secret after all,
Is work, work, work."

"OLD HOPELESS."

He Tells the Pathetic Story of Poor Nancy.

Two great rocky cliffs in Southern Colorado form the walls of a dark abyss something like fifteen feet wide, from the bottom of which comes up the eternal moan of waters as they rush on in the solemn darkness over their rough course to the Rio Grande. The walls of this chasm are over a hundred feet high, and almost perpendicular.

The place is called Purgatory, and not altogether inappropriately, for, standing near its forbidding edge, with the waters seething and moaning far below, it is not improbable that thoughts of the final resort of sin is suggested to the mind of the awe-struck visitor, and cause him "to shudder and grow sick at heart."

To within ten feet of the edge leads a well-worn trail, which abruptly ends at a grave. The latter is marked by neither rough stone nor slab, and the many visitors to the spot are told, by the loquacious mountain guides, of a romantic incident of which this lonely mound is the fatal outcome.

One day in the beautiful summer time in company with my guide, I halted my steed near the edge of Purgatory and took in the widely picturesque scene.

My guide was a hunchback, horribly disfigured in form, and his dress and manners were rough in the extreme. His coarse, iron-gray hair was long and unkempt, and his distorted face was covered with a repulsive shock of beard. From out this growth shone his great dark eyes, whose uncertain expression bespoke a half-vacant mind.

"Old Hopeless" he had been called in my presence, and the landlord of the Colorado House had told me that he was a character of the region, almost entirely insane at times, rational at others, but never dangerous and always a good guide. So, for want of a better, he had been engaged for that day.

When, in the course of our rambles, we drew up at Purgatory, he suddenly burst out in a tumult of incoherent expressions, in which I caught the word "Nancy." I spoke to him. He calmed himself, as if his mind were all at once strengthened by a visitation of reason, and began talking to me in an earnest tone.

"I'll tell ye all about Nancy—Nancy Summers, Felix," he said, in the characteristic dialect of the mountains. "Long years ago she war knowed all over Colorado, an' no one ever said thet her name warn't spotless. Beautiful?—yas, yas, more'n thet. She was ez fair as a May-day moon, ez fresh ez dew-kissed flowers. Her face war a trifle brown from exposure to ther sun, but it war perfect in outline frum forehead ter neck. It war full of firmness, an' tenderness, too, sometimes. Her eyes war a rich, dark brown, an' when a feller looked into 'em, he war her slave forever. Her ha'r war of the same color, an' long an' wavy. Thar never war a better figger ner hers, an' she knowed how ter dress ter set it off. She lived with her parents, who kep' ther Colorado House, ther hotel we left this mornin', Felix. Even at thet day there war a good deal o' travel along hyar, an' they war makin' money.

"Mebbe ther travel war on Nancy's account, for she counted her lovers by ther score, an' she used ter hev a proposal 'bout ever' day in ther week. Ever' young fellow in the Southwest tried his charm on ther purty Nancy, fer gals war gals them days; but they gener'ly drew off mighty quick when they found they made no impression, an' got a firm 'no' in ther teeth.

"One day thar come along a quiet-dispositioned, good-lookin' young feller, who hed a little sheep ranch all his own, not a hundred miles from Purgatory, and he put up at ther Colorado House, and began ter make love ter Nancy. He war happy in ther promisin' name of Luke Golden, an' he war head an' years in love with ther little gal. An', Felix, it warn't long afore it war noised all over the kentry thet he hed succeeded in winnin' Nancy's heart. It war plain ter all thet seen them together thet Nancy liked him mighty well, an her old man had no objections ter him on account of his character.

"Ever' mornin' they used ter go fer a ride, an' sometimes they would gallop side by side fer hours through ther mountains. Often they would visit Purgatory, an' one pleasant day like to-day they drew their hosses up 'bout whar we set now, Felix, an' they set an' listened to ther ceaseless gaspin' of ther water 'way down thar fer a long while in silence. He looked at her finally with an expression of sad disappointment. He hed been pleadin' with her to be his wife, an' while she did not refuse, she would not give her consent. She hed never told him thet she loved him, but her preference fer him showed it, an' it give him hope. No one hed ever stirred ther love in her heart afore, an' she struggled hard against yieldin' to ther feelin'. In her soul she must hev yearned ter be his, but she would not let him see ther truth.

"She set on her hoss ez silent an' motionless ez a statue, fer a long time, an' he looked at her beseechingly, an' with all his passionate love in his eyes. Suddenly she seemed ter be possessed of a desire ter test his love, an' ter see how much power she hed over 'im. To think war ter act with her, and turnin' her beautiful face up to his, she says:

"'Do yer really love me, dear Luke?'

"Her words an' her tones made him wild with love fer her.

"'I swear by ther heavens above, I worship you!' he cried, catchin' her arm an' devourin' her with his love-lit eyes.

"'I am goin' ter test yer affection,' she says:

"'I'll die fer you, Nancy,' he replied. 'Only tell me how I kin prove my love.'

"She didn't withdraw her arm, but looked 'im straight in ther face.

"'You hev boasted thet you ride one of the best hosses in ther Territory,' she says; 'ride 'im across Purgatory, bring me thet little bunch of yeller-jackets over thar, an' I will kiss you an' name the day.'

"He was a ridin' a fine hoss, one he was more'n proud of. He only waited ter give her a long look, and then he spurred his hoss for'ard.

"Mebbe she hed thought 'e wouldn't try it, er thet ther animal wouldn't jump over; but she war mistaken if she hed. Ez he neared ther edge she seemed ter realize what she war doin' —sendin' ther man she loved more'n any bein' on earth inter horrible danger—an' she called him ter come back.

"'O, Luke! don't go!'

"But it was too late. The hoss from Golden Ranch was no common one, but one of the fiery, fearless kind, and when he felt the cruel spurs sink inter his sides he give a wild snort of pain and sprung inter ther air a-flyin' over Purgatory, safe to ther other side.

"Luke plucked ther yellow-jackets, kissed 'em an' waved 'em to her, an' then remountin' he again urged his steed ter leap ther terrible chasm. Hoss an' rider hung fer a minit in ther air. It was awful—it was awful! You kin hev no idea of what it war, Felix. Ther hoss failed to clear the chasm this time. His forefeet struck the edge, an' fer a minit he struggled ter gain a footin' then his hoofs slipped off ther rocks, an', with a cry that was almost human, he fell back—down, down, down, carryin' his rider into the dark an' terrible depths below!

"Poor Nancy! Fer long weeks she laid on her bed with a rackin' fever, ravin' in delirium, an' livin' over an' over again thet fearful scene. She never was conscious long enough ter be made ter understand thet her lover still lived—thet by falling on ther body of his hoss he hed escaped alive, though he was terribly wounded. He never was able ter leave his bed ter see Nancy, an' she wouldn't hev knowed 'im ef he hed. It was long months afore ther fever left her, an' then she hed lost her reason forever. But ther good Lord took mercy on her, an' afore ther warm breezes war blowin' again she hed been laid hyer ter rest. Thet's her grave, Felix.

"They call me 'Old Hopeless' an' say I'm crazy. They're not fer wrong. You've guessed it, Felix—I'm Luke Golden. I rode a fine hoss down to death at ther bottom of Purgatory, fer Nancy's love. I couldn't set up fer over a year after ther terrible fall, an' you see how I hev been ever since—a hunchback, Felix, one of the wust lookin' critters on ther face of ther earth.

"I've never been back to ther ranch. They give me some money fer it, I don't know how much, an' I hev stayed around hyer whar' she used ter be. I'll die before long, Felix, an' they will bury me hyer at Purgatory, beside Nancy. Poor Nancy!"—Arthur C. Grissom, in Yankee Blade.

A Surprising Statement.

We boldly assert that all American china and glazed crockery ware is enameled with a preparation consisting largely of the red oxide of lead, or as it is commonly known, litharge. This salt of lead is very soluble in the fatacids especially in butyric acid. All fatty goods contain this acid and when from the frequent alternate expansion and contraction of the enamel or glazing on the various dishes and plates we use on the table, cracks have formed, the butyric acid insinuates itself under the enamel, takes up the lead, and with the food on the plate is taken into the stomach, where being a cumulative poison it insiduously poisons the system. Do not let us deceive ourselves by thinking that the quantity of lead is small, but remember that the quantity of lead set free by carbonic acid in the water running through a lead pipe is still less, and yet no less authority than Professor Chandler has proven that much lead-poisoning is due to this.—American Analyst.

CATCHING LARKS.

An English Method of Netting Little Birds in Open Fields.

Larks, as a rule, have a habit of roosting on stubble-fields, when such are available, and later on repair for the most parts to fallow lands or occasionally open heaths and moors, preference being generally given to fallow; and it is here that "trammeling" is most generally carried on. The dimensions of the net vary, but the average is: "Length, thirty-six yards; breadth, five or six feet, and mesh either an inch or three-quarters; two light poles some six or seven feet long (bamboo for choice, and fitted together like the joints of a fishing-rod) complete the arrangement. The plan of procedure is simple in the extreme. To work the trammel the services of two men are required, one at each end, and a third usually accompanies the others, carrying a sack to hold the birds. The ground to be operated upon is decided on beforehand, also the direction in which each field shall be worked, this, of course, depending in a great measure on the conformation of the surface, and more still on the direction of the wind. Having arrived at the spot where it is proposed to make a start the net is extended to its full length flat on the ground, the poles being attached to either end, and all is ready to commence operations. The poles, when the net is at work, are held by the workers in such a manner that the bottom end of each just touches the ground, and the upper is depressed sufficiently to make the intervening stretch of net cover the area immediately beneath, without the top edge brushing; the bottom or tail, on the other hand, trails along its entire length, and the rustling noise thus created causes the birds to rise. In theory, to do this seems absurdly easy, but, like throwing a fly or hitting the leader of a team in the exact right spot, it requires no small amount of practice to attain proficiency. The poleman must more forward in perfect time and step, otherwise the net will "bag" and become altogether unmanageable; in the same way it must be dropped smartly and simultaneously at both ends when a bird or birds "strike;" above all, the exact extent of the field being worked must be known to a nicety, so as to allow the pivot man time to make the wheel when the end is reached without getting "tangled up." A couple of adepts will frequently secure fifteen or twenty dozen birds in a night; by no means unremunerative business, whereas two novices would probably not capture two dozen all told. According to Dr. Lister, who occupied the position of physician-in-chief to Queen Anne, the lark, when eaten either boiled or roasted, "helps the colic." How far the theory may be correct we are unable to say, but no one who has tasted the dainty will, we fancy, be inclined to deny that, either in aspic or roast, a dish or lark is fit to set before a king.—Pall Mall Gazette.

CENTRAL CALIFORNIA.

A Trip Through Sacramento Valley, the Land of Sunshine, Fruit and Flowers.

[Special Correspondence.]

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 18, 1888.

Here we are in Sacramento City after a visit to the surrounding country, under a cloudless sky, the thermometer this day standing at forty-eight degrees above zero, merchants doing business with open doors, and people on the streets without wraps, flowers blooming in the open air, oranges and lemons on trees in the door-yards of the cozy residences, a revelation to one who arrives from the frozen east and who has dropped down in four hours from the summit of the Sierras where the snow is ten feet deep and the thermometer at 15 degrees below zero.

Sacramento City is the capital of the State, is located eighty-three miles northeast from San Francisco at the confluence of the American and Sacramento rivers, the latter a navigable stream, and is the railroad center and the largest fruit shipping point in California. Fifty-four trains from seven different directions arrive and depart daily, the shops of the C. P. R. R. furnishing employment to two thousand mechanics and laborers. The city is built upon a level plain, wide streets running at right angles, lettered from A to Y north to south, and 1st to 31st from west to east.

Many fine buildings adorn the residence portion of the city, but many of the business structures with their wide awnings remain as erected during the mining era of thirty years ago, presenting a novel appearance to us from the East. The State Capitol building is modeled after the Capitol at Washington, and cost over two million dollars; is surrounded by grounds not excelled in beauty of landscape gardening and semi-tropical plants by any capital grounds in the United States. The city boasts of the Crocker art gallery costing over four hundred thousand dollars, donated to the city by Mrs. E. B. Crocker, said gallery containing a large collection of choice statuary and paintings, in which is in active operation an art school. This gallery, second to none in the United States, will amply repay the tourist who may visit it.

There are many other fine buildings, among which are the new Catholic cathedral, Masonic and Odd Fellows' temples, different churches, school buildings, and two elegant theaters, numerous hotels and business structures. The city contains about 30,000 population, and has a large wholesale trade, one store having 225 employes. The city is well lighted by two electric light and one gas company. The State fairs are held here in September each year, the State Agricultural Society having a large exposition building and mile race-track.

An exposition building adjoining the railroad depot is being erected, where a continuous exhibit of the products of Central California will be shown and printed information relative to same distributed. The area of Sacramento County is 620,000 acres. The land is of three characters, foothill, plains and river bottom. The foothill land is peculiarly adapted to the production of fruits and grapes. The plains lands are mainly devoted to grain raising, and no failure of crops since the American occupation of this country. In some portions of the county fruits, berries and grapes are extensively produced on this class of land, and from small farms of forty and sixty acres considerable incomes are derived.

The best lands are those on the immediate banks of the rivers, and are devoted to the production of fruits and vegetables. The income per acre is fabulous, enabling the owners of the river-bank orchards to own and manage a line of steamers on which their produce is transported to San Francisco markets or to Sacramento City for shipment East. Previous to the last two years many of these lands were held in large tracts; now the owners are subdividing them and offering them for sale to actual settlers.

For many years California was regarded as valueless save for its mineral wealth, but American enterprise has developed that its richness in the line of agriculture and fruit raising is inferior to none in the world. From the cultivation of cereals the step was taken successfully in the line of fruit and vine raising, and lastly in the growing of oranges and lemons, consequently the fruit-grower here has no waste time, but can, if he will, utilize every day in the year. He may actually gather fruit of some kind from his orchard every month of the year, as the winter fruits embrace oranges, lemons, pomegranates, olives and persimmons, which ripen during the months of November, December and January. The spring fruits embrace strawberries, raspberries, blackberries and cherries, and are marketed in April, May and June. The summer fruits are apricots, plums, peaches, figs, pears and nectarines, and are marketed from June to October. The fall fruits are apples, pears, grapes, quinces, prunes and peaches, to which may be added almonds, walnuts and peanuts. Hops, broom and Egyptian corn, alfalfa, sweet potatoes, etc., are all grown with profit. We who have spent our lives east of the Rocky Mountains can have no reasonable conception of a country that apparently has but two seasons, an autumn and spring, as it is here in the Sacramento valley. The rainfall commences about November 1 and ends in May, but only at intervals during that time, so that with few exceptions there is no cause for suspension from out-door labor. Plowing begins here as soon as the rains commence—in fact, many farmers who summer-fallow their lands in April and May seed the same in August and September before the first rains.

The change from one season to the other is marked with no sudden or severe climatic changes. While sleet and snow, to say nothing of blizzards at this time of the year, are the fortune of the people at the East, here in the Sacramento valley the people are basking under clear skies and can pluck fruits and flowers. The writer noticed in one of the markets this morning the following fruits and vegetables, being informed they were grown in this immediate vicinity: Asparagus, cauliflower, cabbage, celery, artichokes, sweet potatoes, sprouts, spinnach, peas, salsify, string-beans, new potatoes, onions, oranges, lemons, persimmons, English walnuts, almonds and raisins. In an interview with the signal service officer located here, I am informed that this present winter has been an unusually cold one—in fact, the coldest in the past thirty-four years.

A few days since a snow-storm actually swept over the valley and snow fell to the depth of an inch, affording great amusement to men, women and children during the few hours it lay upon the ground. He also informed me that Sacramento County shows a warmer winter, spring, and yearly average temperature and about the same summer and autumn temperature that the great citrus belt in Northern Italy does, as shown by the following table which he kindly furnished me:

	Ave. winter temperature.	Ave. spring temperature.	Ave. summer temperature.	Ave. autumn temperature.	Ave. yearly temperature.	Highest temperature.	Lowest temperature.	Ave. No. of clear days.

A branch of the Central Pacific railroad is being completed to Placerville (or what was known as Hangtown in the early mining days, and which was the objective point of the overland emigrants), the county seat of El Dorado County. Said road is fifty miles long and runs through almost one continuous line of orchards, hop-fields and vineyards, including the famous Natoma vineyard and orchard of 2,000 acres, to Folsom, twenty miles distant from Sacramento.

TEMPERANCE READING.

TO A BROKEN WHISKY JUG.

Thou shattered fragments of polluted clay!
God's mold accursed by man's most cruel foe!
Of fiery blood that from thee flows away,
Each atom tells a tale of deepest woe.

From out thy mouth hath gurgled sin and shame
Suffice to people Hell with vice unspoken;
This drop, that lingers on thy lips, can claim
A mother's yearning heart once to have broken.

The spoonful, left in this, the smallest piece
Of thy wrecked self, is proud to know it slew
A man, who, fortune-tossed, sought sweet surcease
Of grief, and to its constant temptings flew.

The dregs that on thy flinty bottom lie
Well represent dead hopes and loves of those
Who, ere they knew thy poison, could descry
Their future lives as fair as opening rose;

But who now crouch, defiled, beneath the rot
Of crime—to degredation bound, annealed;
By friends of other days disdained, forgot,
Without a home this side of Potter's Field.

The very soil that drinks thy baneful blood,
It seems would taste not Heaven's dew again;
Or, penitently pray the clouds to flood
Away its sin in purifying rain.

A SAD STORY.

He Ruined Home—An Appeal and a Warning to Young Temperance Crusaders.

It doesn't seem right to tell you any thing that will cloud your faces, yet it is, perhaps, best after all, that you should know what sorrow and trouble our old enemy, King Alcohol, brings into the lives of people who are not strongly fortified against him.

Not many months ago I was visiting a friend in a large Western city, and one day she took me in her carriage for a drive, out in the suburbs, where there were many beautiful homes. Bright-eyed, sunny-faced children were playing on the lovely lawns about these homes; children playing croquet; children tossing each other up among the leafy boughs in swings; children in hammocks reading story-books; children digging in the dirt; girls playing "lady;" boys on bicycles; all of them having good times, and so happy it made me happy, too, just to look at them.

After awhile we passed by one of the loveliest homes we had seen yet; roses in bloom everywhere, fountains playing, birds singing, every thing in nature seeming joyous and glad; but there were no children anywhere to be seen, and the house looked shut-up and lonely.

Then my friend told me one of the saddest stories I ever heard. Years before there had been a boy in that home, too; a dear little innocent boy, who was the joy and delight of his papa and mamma and the good grandmother who lived with them. But the papa and mamma thought there was no harm in having wine at their fine dinners, and they let Charlie have a little, too. So he grew to love it, stealing it off the side-board, and thus, before they realized it, and long before he was a man, Charlie became a drunkard. He lost his bright, manly looks and his frank, loving ways, and gave those who loved him many a heartache. He spent all the money he could get in drunken carousals, and one evening after he had lost all he had playing cards, and while he was half-mad with drink, he went home to get more money.

But his father and mother both refused to give him any. Then he went to his grandmother. He felt sure she would give him some, because she always had done so before, but this time she could not, as she had spent all she had at home that day, and it was too late to get any out of the bank.

This made Charlie very angry, and he told her she must give him the costly diamond ring she had on her finger. She did not want to do that, of course, because it was her wedding ring.

Then Charlie cursed her—just think how dreadful that was—and tried to take the ring from her by force. Somehow—he never could tell how it happened—in trying to get the ring, he threw the poor old lady on the floor, and the shock and the fright killed her.

Yes, there she lay, the dear old grandmother whom he had always loved, and who loved him so fondly, who had often held him in her arms as he slept, his little brown head cuddled up on her bosom. How often she had sat by his little bed and told him stories, when he was almost a baby, or knelt beside him and prayed for God's richest blessings upon him. Now she lay there still and cold in death, and Charlie was her murderer.

So that bright day when I saw the lovely home all shut up and silent, he was away off in the penitentiary, behind iron bars, shut up from the sweet, fresh air and sunshine, his heart filled with vain and bitter remorse for the crime he had committed in his drunken madness, while his mother, who had died of a broken heart, slept quietly in her grave beside her murdered mother.

When I heard this sad story my heart ached for Charlie, and for other Charlies all over the land who are taking their first drinks, and so I want every young Temperance crusader to fight more bravely than ever against the demon that destroyed the happiness of that lovely home, and above all things never give him a chance to creep into your lips and darken and blight your lives.—Laura J. Rittenhouse, in Union Signal.

PHYSICIANS' OPINIONS.

Beer "Kills Quicker Than Any Other Liquor"—A Fruitful Source of Many Diseases.

In answer to an inquiry by a correspondent the Voice says:

Not long ago Mr. D. R. Locke, of the Toledo Blade, interviewed ten of the principal physicians of that notoriously beer-guzzling city. This is some of the testimony:

Dr. S. H. Bergen, of thirty-five years' practice, said: "It kills quicker than any other liquor. Pneumonia, pleurisy, fever, etc., have a first mortgage on the beer-drinker."

Dr. S. S. Thorne: "In regard to surgical operations every physician dreads to have any thing to do with beer-drinkers. It is dangerous for a beer-drinker to even cut his finger."

Dr. M. H. Parmalee: "Beer is worse than whisky, the hops contained in the beer producing congestion of the liver, dyspepsia and kindred diseases. Habitual beer-drinkers seem to have no constitutional power to resist disease."

Dr. W. T. Ridenour: "Beer-drinkers are very liable to die of pneumonia, and when a confirmed beer-drinker takes pneumonia he dies."

Dr. S. S. Lungren: "Every part of the body of a confirmed beer-drinker becomes loaded down with morbid and poisonous matter, and every part will soon fall into ruin and decay."

Dr. J. T. Woods: "Lager beer, if used at all, should be used as a medicine, as ipecac, quinine, rhubarb and strychnine."

Dr. C. A. Kirkley: "There is no more fruitful source of Bright's disease than beer-drinking. The evil effects are not confined to the consumers of the beverage, but are transmitted to their offspring."

Dr. C. W. Chapman: "I regard beer as harmful as ardent spirits, brandy and whisky, as it produces fatty degeneration of the heart, liver and kidneys."

Dr. G. A. Collamore: "Beer-drinking produces a morbid effect upon the heart, lungs, brain, stomach, liver and kidneys. The brain is kept in a hyperemic condition which prevents normal cerebration or the accurate use of the mental faculties."

Dr. W. H. Mays, superintendent of the Stockton (Ia.) Insane Asylum, in his ninth biennial report to the State Board of Health, has the following on beer-drinking:

"Nothing will lower the vital forces so steadily and surely, nothing will degenerate the organic tissues so rapidly as the use of beer every day, and year after year. It coarsens a man in appearance, in morals, in mental fiber, in physical constitution. It is more productive of brutality, sensualism, and the lower forms of crime than is whisky-drinking. It is the beverage of the Bill Sykes, of the vulgar ruffian, the bestial tramp."

Temperance Documents.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Kansas brewery cases has been published by the National Temperance Society in neat pamphlet form. The dissenting opinion of Justice Field is included. The decision is one of the most important Temperance documents ever issued. The same society publishes a fac-simile of the infamous hand-bill circulated among the colored people of Atlanta by the whisky party during the recent campaign in that city. A cut is printed representing Abraham Lincoln striking off the shackles from the slave, and below this is given a pretended extract from one of his addresses, warning the people against prohibition. The President is made to say that "a prohibitory law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our Government was founded." There can be no doubt that this poster turned many votes in favor of license. But what can be thought of a class of men who could commit such a foul act as this, who could thus drag the martyred Lincoln from his grave and put a lie between his lips for the purpose of carrying out their own vile ends. There is surely no crime too black for the rum party to commit in the furtherance of its schemes. The saloon breeds crime as naturally as a noisome swamp breeds disease. Theft, arson, forgery, assault, perjury, offenses against decency, wife-beating and murder are only a part of its numerous progeny.—N. Y. Observer.

No Cause for Impatience.

Some of our good friends who are doing so noble work in the temperance cause are inclined to be impatient when they ought to be thankful and full of encouragement. It is not uncommon to hear them say: "The drink curse is growing worse and worse;" "All our efforts in the past have been unsuccessful;" "We have tried this and that method and failed, and now we must try another." These, and similar expressions, often appear in print, and are sometimes heard on the Temperance platforms, while in private conversation, among a certain class of people, they form the staple of their utterances. But the truth is that hardly any cause has made so rapid progress, of late years, as that of Temperance. The private drinking habits of good society have been, to a large extent, reformed, and public drinking was never so unpopular as it is to-day. The ban that has been put upon the liquor traffic, together with the war made upon it by men and women, exhibit it as a business that must, within a short time, be reduced to helplessness, if not entirely exterminated.—United Presbyterian.

In Oxford County, Maine, a man was passing through a wood lot and was startled to see a bird start almost under his feet and fly away. Looking carefully ahead of him he saw a dozen or more black specks on the snow. Closer inspection proved that each of these was the head of a partridge. The birds sat quite still until he was almost near enough to touch them, then shook themselves free from the light snow and flew hurriedly away.

FURNISHING A ROOM,

How to Produce a Warm, Agreeable and Pleasant Effect.

In a well-furnished house—the furniture of which may have cost twenty-five thousand dollars or five hundred no one article stands out in violent contrast to its neighbors, either in color or in quality, but each helps to produce a harmonious whole. As the writer has said elsewhere, furnishing may be done artistically without following rigidly all the rules of high art. There is such a thing as carrying art to an extent that produces a cold, disagreeable effect. A few fundamental rules, however, can not be disregarded with impunity; and these concern appropriateness, proportion, simplicity, harmony and stability. There should be no overcrowding on the one hand, nor bareness on the other; and there should be a central tone of color, to which all the tints must be subordinate.

Carpets are the very foundation of a good or ill effect in furnishing; and they are usually, too, the point of extravagance. Three or four dollars a yard will be paid for a parlor carpet, while showy, machine-made furniture takes the place of substantial articles with lines of grace and beauty. The coloring of this carpet is frequently an offence to a cultivated eye, and utterly inharmonious with the other furnishings. Obtrusive, dominating colors should be avoided—likewise a white ground, which always has a glaring effect. Scarlet is a very unmanageable color, and should never be seen in a floor covering.

Small, rugby figures are always desirable, and quite a necessity in small rooms; and carpets of this character, made up with a rich border, and supplemented with a margin of inlaid or stained floor, will often be as effective as an imported rug. A good, five-frame, body Brussels can be bought now at a very reasonable rate—as well as the softer Moquette; and made up as a large rug, either carpet is both handsome and stylish for almost any room. There are also beautiful ingrains with borders; and many an ingrain at eighty cents is preferable to many a Wilton at treble the price—the carpet not being intended for decoration, but for comfort, and to show to advantage the articles placed on it.

Besides, one wants a few etchings and engravings, at least; and if there is no special sum set apart for them, they had better be taken out of the carpet.

Wall papers are quite as great marplots as carpets; and a paper which is very pretty in the piece, may utterly ruin a room. Subdued coloring is very desirable here, and as few colors as possible; a paper at twenty-five cents a roll will sometimes make a room look better than one at $2.50. A dado should never be used with a low ceiling; and the coloring of the frieze should not be in violent contrast to that below it, but rather gather up and concentrate what is already there.

Both paper and carpet are intended to serve as backgrounds, and should therefore be in subdued styles. The ingrain, or cartridge papers are admirably calculated for this purpose, and they are moderate enough in price to be within the reach of most purses.

Whatever else the young householder may do, let her avoid buying a "set" of furniture covered with silk plush. Sets of any kind are objectionable; but silk-plush that is sat upon and used wears badly, and entirely loses its original color. Mohair-plush is another matter; but much furnishing of any plain color becomes monotonous. Figured goods are preferable for ordinary wear, and one does not tire of them so easily.—Ladies' Home Journal.

VALUABLE ADVICE.

An Experienced Detective Offers a Suggestion to Housekeepers.

"There are only ten persons in a thousand who, when they hear strange noises in their house, do not immediately make a light to find out the cause," said one of the detectives of a private agency. "This is the most absolute piece of folly a sane person can commit, and yet it only seems natural. But let me tell you that when you hear any noise that indicates the presence in your house of a person who has no business there, first take the precaution to put out the light. Then, if you want to search do so in the dark. Of course you know the house better than any intruder, and the chances are that if you keep quiet the intruder will expose himself either by showing a light or stumbling over something. Then you have the advantage of knowing his position without his knowing yours.

"There is many a murdered man in his grave to-day who would have been alive had this advice been followed. What can be more preposterous than the idea of a man in his right mind (knowing that if a burglar is in his house and is discovered he will take desperate means) actually offering himself as a target by appearing with a light in his hand, which does no more good than to betray his presence, as it is only natural that he can not see three feet beyond the rays of the light. Take the record of murders committed where only burglary was intended, and you will find that three-quarters of them are due to the folly of searching for the burglar with a light."—N. Y. Sun.

"On the hat rack."—Omaha World.

—Scientists claim that a tide mill located at the Bay of Fundy would generate 700,000 horse-power twelve hours a day. This distributed electrically and sold to every State in the Union would save the coal supply.

—The Electrical Review says that the uselessness of the lightning-rod is becoming so generally understood that the agents find their vocation a trying one. Fewer and fewer rods are manufactured each year, and "the day will come when a lightning-rod on a house will be regarded in the same light as a horseshoe over a man's door."

A year ago the Niobrara Land and and Cattle Company, which has become bankrupt, refused $1,000,000 for its property. Instead of the big companies swallowing the little ones, it is thought that the tendency is toward the breaking up of the big ranches into smaller ones.

—A chemical explanation of Ireland's distress is that it is due to too exclusive subsistence upon potatoes. Though a healthful luxury, this food alone supplies too little nutrition to support people other than in a half-starved and dissatisfied condition. It is probable, therefore, that Ireland's woes would be greatly reduced if the productive soil and climate were applied to the growth of nutritive cereals instead of the tubers.

—The latest idea in the direction of waterproof foot-wear is a shoe made with a stout calfskin vamp, seamless, underlying which is a vamp of thin rubber, and between it and the lining, which is of stout canvas. The bottom of the shoe has a rubber interlining between the outer and the inner soles, and thus the shoe is about as near waterproof as a leather shoe can be. It is said to wear well and preserve its waterproof qualities for an indefinite period.

—A sound issuing from a fog gives no trustworthy indication of the direction of its source. A recent writer gives two cases in his own experience near Newport when the sound from a fog-horn at Beaver Tail seemed to come from several directions, each ten or fifteen degrees apart, and there is a well-known case where a transatlantic steamer, bound to New York, going direct but slow, and sounding her whistle, finally picked up a pilot who declared he had heard the blast for half an hour and that the steamer had been sailing around him in a circle.

LIFE IN HINDOSTAN.

A Buffalo (N. Y.) Lady Writes of Her Home in the Jungle.

Miss Mary Graybiel, one of the missionaries sustained in India by the sect known as Disciples, writes very interesting letters to her family in this city. It is now over four years since she went to Hindostan, in company with the Rev. Mr. Wharton, formerly pastor of the Church of Christ, and his wife. The place at which Miss Graybiel is now located is in the heart of India, on the line of the railroad which is to be built from Bombay directly across to Calcutta. The children of the Sunday-schools of the denomination in the United States contributed a fund of some four thousand dollars with which to erect a house for this mission, and in her last letter she modestly tells how the work was done.

It appears that she had to serve as architect, master, builder and general boss mechanic. First, she bought four yoke of buffalos to do the teaming; then a few big trees—they are very scarce in that part of the country. She employed a hundred natives, or nearly that number, whom she taught to quarry stone, which had to be hauled several miles, and to make brick, first trampling the clay, fashioning it into bricks, and then burning them, using the spare portions of the trees for fuel. The trunks of the trees were laboriously by hand sawed into boards for the floors, roof, etc. A stone foundation three feet thick was laid three feet below ground and as much above, this solid base wall being deemed necessary to keep out the white ants, which are a great pest of the country. Evidently a good job was made of the wall, for Miss Graybiel ingenuously relates that an Englishman visitor inquired who had been the engineer, and expressed much surprise when she told that she had directed the work herself.

It takes a Buffalo girl to hold her own among the heathen, or any where else. Incidentally Miss Graybiel states that the son of a German missionary living some forty miles distant was killed by a tiger. She attended the funeral, making the journey through the solid jungle in a cart drawn by a pair of the buffalos, with the chance of being sprung upon by that or some other tiger at any moment. Such is life in the wilds of Hindostan.—Buffalo Courier.

STORIES OF ELEPHANTS.

The Esteem in Which the Huge Animals Were Held by the Ancients.

The ancients, who are sparing in their praises of the dog, (by far the larger part of the world has always abhorred him as the very type of uncleanness), could not speak too highly of the elephant. The elder Pliny, who was a diligent collector of anecdotes rather than an observer, surpasses himself when he treats of this animal. He places him as unquestionably next to man. Intelligence, obedience, memory, ambition, affection, honesty, prudence and justice are among the catalogue of virtues which he ascribes to these creatures. He even declares that they are religious, worshiping the stars, the sun and the moon, an assertion in which he is followed by Plutarch and Ælian. The stories which he tells of their sagacity and aptitude for acquiring accomplishments are marvelous. That they should go through the motions of a dance or a gladiatorial combat is credible. Busbecq tells of one which he himself saw in Turkey that danced and played at ball. But our faith is taxed when we read of four elephants walking on tight ropes, carrying another in a litter. Yet the testimony of the ancients as to this particular accomplishment is very strong. Possibly the funambulism of elephants is one of the lost arts of antiquity. Writing also is an accomplishment which we fear the animal no longer acquires. Mucianus, the friend of Vespasian, knew of an animal which could write a Greek hexameter, not, however, out of its own head; and we have a pathetic story of one which, having been beaten for being somewhat backward in its reading—for the elephants own the human trait of having dunces among them—was found diligently conning its task by night. It was, however, in a sterner character than that of dancer or scholar that antiquity best knew the elephant. He was a most formidable implement of war. The Carthaginians were the first so to utilize him in European warfare, and it is a remarkable fact that they, and they only, have been able to educate the African species of the race for human uses. It may be doubted, indeed, whether the military utility of the animal compensated for the enormous expense and trouble which he must have caused. If Hannibal had not lost all his elephants but one almost before he began his campaign he would certainly have found it impossible to feed them. Their use, indeed, in Western warfare has not been frequent. One of the latest occasions of their employment seems to have been by the Emperor Claudius when he invaded Britain in the third year of his reign. They are still found, but for show rather than use, in the military establishments of the East. But it is clear that they could not exist in the face of the arms of precision.—London Spectator.

To Allay Common Garget.

Anthrax and tuberculosis are both contagious. The first is very sudden in its action, but rarely attacks cows, and is not so dangerous to the human family. Tuberculosis does not strike an animal down suddenly and is often a hidden foe in the milk-pail. Garget is often, though not always, the result of this disease. When it is difficult to get rid of, and one-fourth or more of the udder is hard, it may be considered dangerous to those using the milk. I am not sure that the meat of such cows is unfit for food if they are not otherwise affected. To allay common garget, ten drops of nitre or a teaspoonful of saltpeter, two or three times per day is good. Garget is too often the result of abuse, though it may be constitutional.—Dr. Noah Cressy, in Farm and Home.

Knowledge and Truth.

A desire for knowledge is by no means the same as a desire for truth. One often studies industriously in order to acquire facts, without being interested in the use to which those facts shall be put. Another seeks to know the truth in a given line of research; and in his seeking he gathers facts industriously as a means of arriving at the truth. A truth-seeker is pretty sure to find the truth. A knowledge-seeker is often kept from perception of the truth by the very knowledge which he has gathered aimlessly. It is greatly to a young man's credit that he is a truth-seeker. It is not always to his credit that he is a knowledge-seeker.—S. S. Times.

Dyspepsia

Makes many lives miserable, and often leads to self-destruction. Distress after eating, sick headache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depression, etc., are caused by this very common and increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla tones the stomach, creates an appetite, promotes healthy digestion, relieves sick headache, clears the mind, and cures the most obstinate cases of dyspepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. In an hour after eating I would experience faintness or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced. It relieved me of that faint, tired, all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better since I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am happy to recommend it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass.

A "Put and Call."

This is a funny phrase to the unmitiated, but all the brokers understand it. They use it when a person gives a certain per cent. for the option of buying or selling stock on a fixed day, at a price stated on the day the option is given. It is often a serious operation to the dealer, but there is a more serious "put and call" than this: when you are "put" to bed with a severe cold and your friends "call" a physician. Avoid all this by keeping in the house Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. The great cure for pulmonary and blood diseases. Its action is marvelous. It cures the worst cough, whether acute, lingering, or chronic. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Short Breath, Consumption, Night-sweats, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines.

Weak and Nervous.

These are the feelings of which so many complain. They are weak, tired and exhausted; they have no appetite, no strength, no life or ambition to work; may become irritable, cross, blue and discouraged; in some cases there are pains and aches in various parts of the body, and there is often indigestion, dyspepsia, gas, dull head and general dispirited feeling. RESTLESS AND SLEEPLESS NIGHTS. Sleepless, restless and wakeful nights follow. Neglect of these symptoms results in excessive nervous prostration or paralysis, with numbness, trembling, cold feet and legs, prickling sensation and weakness and weariness of the limbs. Thousands become prostrated, paralyzed or insane AND PARALYSED. Many by neglecting the first symptoms, not knowing that the nervous irritability, gloom of the mind, loss of memory, nervous weakness and depression show MENTAL DEPRESSION, an exhaustion of nerve force which will, unless the proper restorative remedy is used, result in utter mental collapse and absolute prostration of nerve and physical power. Chinese Advice to Tea Drinkers.

A Chinaman gives the following advice to tea drinkers. If followed it would do away with some of the injurious effects of this beverage as commonly concocted: Use black tea. Green tea when good is kept at home. What goes abroad is bad, very bad and horrible. Besides containing the 203 adulterations the Chinese philanthropist puts up for the outside barbarian, it is always pervaded by copper dust from the dirty curing-pans of the growers. Infuse your tea, Don't boil it! Place one teaspeonful of tea in the pot and pour over it 1½ cups of boiling water, that is, water really boiling. If your tea is poor, use more. It is cheaper, though, to buy good tea at the outset, Put your pot on the back part of the stove, carefully covered, so that it shall not lose its heat, and the tea its bouquet. Let it remain there five minutes, then drink it. Drink your tea plain. Don't add milk or sugar. Tea-brokers and tea-tasters never do; epicures never do; the Chinese never do.

In the Directory to the Iron and Steel Works of the United States, just issued by the American Iron and Steel Association, it is said that "thirty furnaces are now under construction, and of these nineteen are being built in Alabama (seventeen to use coke and two to use charcoal), three in Tennessee. two in Maryland, two in Ohio, and one each in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Michigan and Wisconsin." Thus out of a total of thirty furnaces actually building at present, twenty-five are in the Southern States. In addition to these, a number of others are projected, some of which will doubtless be built in the near future.

Wise Words.

A man's part is to bear misfortunes rightly.

It is the cause and not the death that makes the martyr.

Borrowing is the canker and the death of every man's estate.

Trusting to luck is only another name for trusting to laziness.

The thing which we do not mean to say is frequently the thing which is said.

It is not enough to study life, one must live it if one would be truly an artist.

Envy is the sunshine of another's life, making the shadow of our own seem deeper.

It is better to be discarded without ceremony than being endured with patience.

Every man is in some sort a failure to himself. No one ever reaches the height to which he aspires.

No man ever got rid of a lie by telling it; it is sure to come home sooner or later to hobnob with its author.

When I caution you against becoming a miser, I do not therefore advise you to become a prodigal or a spendthrift.

Some things after all come to the poor that can't get in at the doors of the rich, whose money somehow blocks up the entrance way.

Time is the greatest of tyrants and extortioners. As we go toward age he taxes our health, our limbs, our faculties, our strength and our features.

Where there is abuse, there ought to be clamor; because it is better to have our slumbers broken by the fire bell than to perish amid flames in our bed.

They say that the truth is not to be spoken at all times, which is the equivalent of saying that truth is an invalid, who can only take the air in a close carriage with a gentleman in a black coat on the box.

They must have the civil service business down to a very fine point in China. This is the way they do it, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer: "The Yellow River burst its bank in a time of great flood, and the story of the terrible disaster it caused has already been told. It appears, however, from the reports in the Chinese official papers, that no difficulty was had in finding somebody responsible for the catastrophe. Public works were in progress on the bank of the stream at the time—an effort to extend the embankments and keep the river within bounds—and no sooner had the outbreak taken place than Chieng-fu, Director General of the Province of Honan, in which it occurred, sent off a report to the Imperial Government, detailing the calamity, charging the officers in charge of the river works, including himself, with "unpardonable remissness," and recommending that they be degraded. The cheerful promptness with which this exemplary officer besought punishment for himself and his associates is worthy of all praise, and one would think, should have moved the most rigid disciplinarian to mercy, but his Imperial Majesty's Government is of spartan mold. It did, indeed, acquit the unhappy Director General, not in mercy, but as an act of strict justice, saying: 'In view of the fact that the memorialist has been only a short time at his post, we commend, as a special act of grace, that he be exempted from the penalty which he requests.' But it more than made up for its leniency to him by its severity to the other culprits. Considering that he had recommended for them 'an unduly light form of punishment,' it not only degraded five of them, but ordered them to be exposed along the banks of the river, while the mandarin in charge of the circuit was deprived of his button and handed over to a board—not for trial, but merely to determine the extent of his punishment.

Some of Last Year's Inventions.

According to the New York Sun, here are some of the inventions made during 1887:

A small, round, rubber mat, with little spikes all over it, on which the cashier drops the silver change, and from which the customer easily picks it up.

A cheese cutter, consisting of a swing knife by which the grocer can, with certainty, cut ten ounces from the cheese whenever the customer orders half a pound.

A baloon which carries a lightning rod high in air over an oil tank.

A cigar selling machine that drops out an all-Havana, clips the end off, and exposes a match and a piece of sandpaper, whenever a nickel or lead blank is placed in a slit in the side of the machine.

A nose protector (Idaho invention) by which a woolen pad is snugly carried on the end of the nose in cold weather.

An electrical boot blacking machine, in which a brush is rapidly revolving in a non-rotating handle. The whirling brush brings the shine in one-tenth of the time of the old vibratory elbow method.

A rubber funnel which may be fitted over the head, big end up, so as to enclose all the hair while the barber shampoos a customer. A tube hangs down behind, so as to carry away the suds, while a hose for flushing out the hair, a funnel and a tube are provided.

A monstar bicycle, with places for two men in a basket swung below the axle, who operate the mechine with leavers geared to the axle.

A decoy duck with a variety of detachable heads.

An air pump to force oil from a tank on a ship over a stormy sea.

A fan rotated by the wheels of a baby carriage to keep the flies off the baby.

A church pew that looks like a pew, but has comfortable chairs within.

A device which will prevent the most restless indivinual from kicking the clothes off the bed. It is the invention of a Chicago woman.

A new gun with a battery in the stock, and cartridges which have coils of platinum wire where the cap is. Pressing the trigger connects the coil with the battery.

A combined rocking chair and cradle (indescribable.)

A combined kitchen ventilator and clock winder, being a device for connecting the ventilator wheels commonly placed in windows with the family clock.

Twelve Resolutions.

1. I will recolect every day that I am mortal, and that in this life I am prepared for eternity.

2. I will consider myself as accountable to God for the right use of my time and all I possess.

3. I will take the Bible as "a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path," and will pray for the Holy Spirit to teach me, and to impress all its truths on my heart.

4. I shall keep sacred the Lord's day, and faithfully attend on the worship of God.

5. I will "keep the heart with all dilligence," when all things go well with me, and in time of trouble.

6. I will make it my constant endeavor to do all the good I can to all with whom I am connected.

7. I will not eat or dring any kind or quantity of food that I have reason to believe will be hurtful to health, or unfit me for the duties of life.

8. If I am tempted to anger or to speak hastily, I will take time for reflection.

9. I will live under the deep conviction that I am a sinner, utterly unable to save myself, and will rest in Christ alone for the pardon of my sins, and the salvation of my soul.

10. Under a sense of my own weakness, I will daily pray for the Spirit of God to make me whole in soul and body.

11. I will strive after holiness of heart and life, through the knowledge and love of my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

12. I will continually look forward to the pure, perfect, and lasting enjoyments of Heaven.

Of the Representatives in Congress 316 are lawyers, and of the delegates 5. Several of the States have delegations composed entirely of them. Mississippi has 7, South Carolina 7, Texas 10, Vermont 2 and West Virginia 4. The farmers number 12, and with the planters 17. There are 13 manufacturers, 13 merchants, 10 bankers, 10 journalists, 6 physicians, 3 ministers, 2 druggists, a stenographer, 1 railroad president, 1 stock raiser, 1 brewer and 1 cooper. One hundred and seventy-eight members were educated in colleges and universities.

No man can truly say he is happy and healthy and that he loves everybody when he owes a year's subscription to a newspaper and has corns.

ROAD PETITION.

This is to give notice that the undersigned will after the expiration of thirty days from the first publication of this notice, petition the County Commissioners of Garrett county to appoint examiners to alter the public road lately located from Wilson's Store to Swanton, said road beginning at Wilson's Store running through the lands of J. H. Wilson & Bro., Perry Spiker, Jos. R. Anderson, J. H. Harshberger, J. C. Beckman, and Rudolph Beckman, and intersecting the Swanton road at the old McRobie place. The proposed alteration to be as follows: To change the location of the aforesaid public road from where it is now located, so as to run from the Northwest corner of John C. Beckman's land on the Swanton road and thence through the lands of J. R. Anderson, J. B. Friend, Ira E. Friend, H. Glover and Wm. H. Wright, a distance less than two miles, to the Spring drain near the "Hogan" place, thence through the lands of J. H. Wilson & Bro. to Wilson's Store.

EDWIN F. ABELL. WALTER R. ABELL.

The BALTIMORE WEEKLY SUN continues to preserve its position, maintained for many years, as a model Family Newspaper, During the past year, in order to accommodate the great variety of matter seeking admission to its columns, it has been found necessary to issue a Supplement almost every weak, presenting a home newspaper unequaled for freshness and variety. Its literary features are selected with discriminating taste and with special reference to the entertainment and instruction of the family circle. Its Agricultural and Veterinary Departments, edited by specialists, have been of great value to the Farmer, while its Fashion Articles, Household Recipes, etc., have continued to be a source of weekly interest and intruction to ladies. The latest news up to the hours of publication is given in its correspondence and telegraphic dispatches, while its editorials, besides discussing current events in an impartial spirit, afford much wholesome advice and suggestion on social, economic and other topics. The proceedings of Congress, the Maryland and other Legislatures, the National Political Conventions, and the Presidential and Congressional elections are among the important features that will be promptly and copiously presented in its columns during 1888.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

The Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright: It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.

Married by Accident.

Marriages are often the result of accident. It seems strange, but the most prudent persons will sometimes conceive an irresistible attachment at the suggestion of a word or look. When once under the spell of the verb "to love" they go through all the forms and finish the conjugation of the verb before the altar. The few may give this subject the consideration it deserves, but the many, there is reason to fear, are guided by impulse. A skipper of a coasting vessel called at the village inn and asked the landlady, a young widow: "Do you know where I can get a mate? I have lost my mate."

"I am very sorry for you, Mr.——," she said, smiling. "I want a mate, too, and cannot get one. I'll tell you what I'll do; if you'll be mine I'll be yours." He closed with the bargain, and the widow keeping her word, he is now supplied with two mates.

A young man at a church bazar was buttonholed by a lady; she would not let him go until he bought something. He looked at her stall, which contained fancy work of various kinds.

"Why" he said, "I see nothing here that would be of the least use to me, a bachelor, except yourself. The rest would be dear to me at any price.

"I will be cheap enough," she said, coaxingly.

"If you could be dear enough, perhaps——"

"O, come! You are just the person I want," taking him by the arm.

She sold him one article after another, keeping up an agreeable conversation the while, and before all was done he had purchased every thing on the stall. Then, at settling up, there was something said about discount.

"I cannot return any money," she said, blushing, "but if you think me dear enough, there's mamma. She can give you my hand. The bargain was accordingly concluded.

An eminent doctor, who had saved the life of a lady, a personal friend, was asked his charge. He said he generally allowed his patient friends to remunerate him as they thought befitting.

"But don't you often get disappointed on these terms," she inquired.

'I may say, never."

'As you are so easily pleased—here," and she playfully gave him her empty hand, while in the other was concealed a check for a handsome sum. "How easily I could have taken you in!" she added, producing the check.

"But you have only succeeded in drawing me out," he said, declining to relinquish her hand. "Don't insult me with a check; I am most generously rewarded."

Perhaps she understood the doctor's difficulty and wished to help him out of it. At any rate, the giving of her hand led him to offer his heart.

This was how a gentleman got his wife when, in a tobacconist's shop, he asked a girl behind the counter, who happened to have red hair, if she would oblige him with a match.

"With pleasure, if you will have a red-headed one," she promptly replied, with such a suggestive, demure smile, that eventually the red-headed match was handed over.

A lady with a fine figure having taken a fancy to a valuable ring, which she saw ticketed in a shop window, went inside to examine it. "It is exceedingly lovely; I wish it were mine," she said on satisfying herself. "What smaller figure will tempt you?"

"No other figure than the figure before me," he said, giving her an admiring look at the same time. "It is exceedingly lovely. I wish—I could tempt you with the ring."

"I think I'll take it," she said, laying down the money amid blushed. Of course he accepted the money, but, getting her address, he made such good use of the hint that the next ring which she got was given by him in church.

Quite as singular was the beginning of the courtship of the man who went into a shop for a pair of shoes.

"I want them wide, please," he said to the girl in attendance, "as I have a good broad understanding."

She laughed at this reference to the breadth of his feet, and said:

"A very good thing, too, in a man, but not in woman."

"How do you make out that what is good in one sex is bad in the other?"

"Ah, it is quite simple. You see nature intended man to be supported by a firm soul, but woman by a yielding husband."

Whether he made a yielding husband or not, report at any rate says that he made her his wife.—London Rare Bits.

The Circus Didn't Show.

Texas Sittings.

John P. Smith, the theatrical manager, whose recent benefit at the Star theater was a handsome testimonial to his popularity in New York, tells the following story of two circus advertisers well known in their day, Charley Castle and "Doctor" Jones. These two worthies were advertising a circus in Virginia just after the war.

One day they reached Lexington, Va., where Stonewall Jackson is buried. Their first move was to find the clerk of the corporation and arrange for a license. Southern officials did not look kindly on show people from the north, and they often charged a license that made a showman turn pale. Jones, who was a ready talker, set out to propitiate the clerk.

"A brave fight you made of it," said Jones, after making themselves known.

"We did the best we could," said the clerk, who carried the scars of numerous battles.

"But the valor of the gods themselves," exclaimed Jones, grandiloquently, "backed by the purest and most exalted patriotism, could not have withstood such overwhelming odds as were brought against you. Yet while fearfully scourged by the demons of war, you have the proud satisfaction of knowing that you came out of the sanguinary struggle with honor still bright and untarnished."

"Are you a Southern man, sir?" asked the clerk.

"Yes—no—well, partially. I was born in the southern portion of Philadelphia. I may say that I sympathized strongly with the Southern cause."

"That's what ailed me," chimed in Castle, mentally figuring on the amount of reduction they were likely to get on the license.

"By the way," Jones went on, "near your town, I am told, repose the earthy remains of one of the bravest and most distinguished defenders of the Stars and Bars—noble Stonewall Jackson."

"Yes," replied the clerk, "he is buried in the little graveyard up on the hill yonder."

"The purest man and the greatest soldier that America has ever produced," exclaimed Jones, enthusiastically. "His name engraven on the enduring walls of eternity. His deeds will be recalled by the historian, the orator and the poet when the names of Grant, Sherman and Sheridan are lost in oblivion. How far is it up to that cemetery?"

"About three miles."

"Oh, come to business," interrupted Castle, impatiently.

"I can do no business," said Jones in a tone of stern reproof, "until I have first made a pilgrimage to the grave of Stonewall Jackson. Come, Castle, it is a pious duty for us both."

It was a hot day and the roads deep with dust, so Castle did not relish the pilgrimage very much, but circus licenses came high in the South and he was disposed to try the uses of conciliation. Towards the close of the afternoon Castle and Jones might have been seen returning from the cemetery on the hill, dusty and tired, each with a buttonhole bouquet formed of material gathered at the grave of the hero they professed to worship. When they again found the clerk Jones burst forth:

"I have visited the hermitage of Andrew Jackson, I have wandered in groves of Monticello, I have stood by the tomb of the immortal Washinuton himself, but I look upon this as the greatest and most exalted pilgrimage of my life!"

"Yes, sir, and I want to add—"

"Add nothing," broke in Castle, tired of this roundabout way of doing business; "what I want to know is, how much do you charge here for a circus license?"

"Four hundred and fifty dollars," replied the clerk.

From Castle—"WHAT!"

"Four hundred and fifty dollars."

"Why blank blank your blankety blank to blank and blanknation!" yelled Castle fairly dancing with rage; "the war ended too soon. You wasn't licked enough!"

That circus didn't show in Lexington.

There is one crop which never fails. It belongs to the chicken.

The Convention and its Work.

The Convention of Republican Clubs has met, done its work, and gone home, and the results of its labors are before the people of West Virginia. The first thing to be said of this body is, that for intelligence and general character, it has never been excelled by any gathering in this State. It is the common expression of the citizens of Wheeling representing all parties, that the men who came here to this Republican Convention, bore themselves everywhere as gentlemen should. This of course will be very gratifying to the Republicans of the State, whom these men came to Wheeling to represent.

When this club movement was first suggested, there were Republicans, as intelligent and earnest as any others, who doubted the wisdom of such a gathering so early in the year. They argued that it would stir up the Democratic party, increase desperate efforts of the Democratic leaders to keep up the spirit in their followers, and by giving early notice of Republican organization and Republican determination, increase the obstacles in the way to victory.

No man who sat in that Convention, as a delegate or spectator, can now doubt the entire wisdom of the movement which has thus far shown fruit in the organization of this splendid League of working Republicans, the new instrument placed in the hands of the Republican party for the redemption of West Virginia from the rule of the Democracy. We are going to fight this year, we are going to begin early, we are going to keep it up late, and we shall not cease working from now until the close of the polls on the day of the election. This is the spirit which animates the whole body of the Republicans of West Virginia.

Every thinking man in the party realizes that our numbers have become so great, and the dividing line of the majority between the two parties so narrow, that to halt, that to hesitate, to wait to see what the enemy will do, to go about by night with dark lanters, or by day wearing masks, would be precisely the way not to sweep West Virginia over to the Republican side.

The key-note of the Convention was, "We lead, let those follow who can." This is a good motto for all Republicans in this important campaign. Thus inspired, thus determined, thus aggressive, watching closely every point, occupying every possible ground of advantage, the chances are more than even for such a triumph of Republican principles, as shall shatter forever the reign of Democratic rule in West Virginia. Republicans of West Virginia, are you ready for the charge? Forward along the whole line!—Wheeling Intelligencer

MY MOTHER'S SLIPPER.

It's mighty cur'us, so it is, how these here poets try
To bring a sympathetic tear to some poor fel lor's eye,
A-chymin' and a singin' of a mother's love and care,
An' touchin' on her faded gown, or stout, old-fashioned chair,
But none of 'em, I've noticed, an' I've wondered o'er and o'er,
Has sung about the slipper that my good old mother wore.

I recollect as well as if 'twas only yesterday,
When it seemed a dreadful waste o' time to study 'stead o' play
With other little youngsters who were hookin' off from school
An' goin' to the swimmin'-hole, so shady, deep and cool,
An' many a time I'd 've missed my chance, through learnin's heights to soar,
Ef 'twerèn't for the slipper that my good old mother wore.

An' later when the female sex began to interest,
An' other fellows called on gals dressed up in their best,
She knowed that though I couldn't keep myself to save my life,
That like as not I'd undertake supportin' of a wife;
But I waited for maturer years and her whom I adore—
All swivin' to the slipper that my good old mother wore.

She's settin' in her arm-chair now a smilin' all benign,
A-talkin' to our neighbors 'bout that "grown-up son o' mine,"
An' she tells of all the time she felt obliged myself to whale,
To keep me out of prison, or at very least from jail;
An' she allers makes me own that I'd been there long before,
Ef it wasn't for the slipper that my good old mother wore.

A SLIP OF PAPER.

The Part It Played in a Case of Circumstantial Evidence.

"O, dear, I am so tired," murmured Katie Rinway, as she sank into the comfortable car seat. "I don't think I had an idea how tired I was until I gave up," she went on, to herself. "I don't think I could have taught another day. It just makes me sick to think of the number of times I have said one—two—three—four during the last year. Horrid little wretches! I wish I had banged their heads against the wall while I had a chance—but there, I'm growing 'enthusiastic' to say the least," and she checked herself with something between a hysterical sigh and a sob, as she reflected with satisfaction that for six long months she need not count any more.

She had truly come to the end of her tether by the time the sweet, warm June days came round, and her kindly physician had given her the choice between giving up her work now and building up for the future, or continuing a little longer, only to sink into confirmed invalidism, to be a burden to her friends and public charity. Frightened at her own state, and firmly believing the wise words said to her, she had concluded at last to accept an invitation given her long ago to come and spend any length of time with her dear friend Madge Wharton, now Mrs. Jack Wilding. It had been agreed, therefore, that this poor and pretty young woman should go down to Madge's country home and assist her in entertaining her guests.

"For you know, Katie dear," Mrs. Wilding had written, "with my hands full of twins, (and I never neglect my babies, no matter what turns up), and all the company dear Jack does have in the summer, and all the company I have invited myself for a week or two weeks at a time, such an amiable individual as yourself at my finger ends will be an immense help, to say nothing of the relief you'll be. I consider your ill-health my especial blessing, however unpleasant it may be for you."

The result of all this was, Katie had given up her rooms, packed her belongings in her two trunks, sent back the rented piano, and now, as I began to relate, was seated in the cars for Engleside. That wasn't the name of the town, by the way, that was only the name of the country-seat. But it is as good a name as any.

So she settled herself comfortably, and as soon as the conductor had punched her ticket for the third time in fifteen minutes, and she knew that she was to have immunity from his oppressive attentions for a half hour's run, she proceeded to take a nap. Waking up in time for the fourth punch, she found herself much refreshed and prepared to take some notes of things round her for some sketches she meant to make for an obscure daily, to which she contributed at times.

Growing tired of this occupation, she laid her pencil in her lap, and sat idly tapping the floor with her foot, as she gazed dreamily out of the window. Slipping her fingers down the crack at the end of the seat she came in contact with a piece of paper.

As it takes but little to arouse one's curiosity when there is but little of vital interest at hand, she went through some little maneuvering to secure the morsel of paper. On it was the legend: "I would like to become better acquainted." A scornful smile curved her lips as she said to herself, "some fool of a girl or other has been trying to get up a flirtation" (for the writing was evidently feminine) and with contempt in her heart for the woman who could so far forget herself, she threw the paper out of the open window.

Another hour and she was safely ensconced in Madge Wilding's pretty "blue room" of which, no matter what happened or who came, she was to be queen as long as she remained. And to the weary, overtaxed girl, the pretty room, in all its simple elegance, for Madge had too much tact to oppress a poor guest with too much display, was a treat in itself.

"Now, Jack," that small woman was saying as Katie came into the dining-room to dinner, "behold, my prime minister. Bring on your company! Now that I have a right hand man (or woman, rather,) I don't care much what you do."

"All right, Mrs. Madame. If you have reached that reckless state in regard to my actions, I shall immediately go back to six cigars a day."

"No, sir—three. Three is what you are allowed and I shall soon cut you down to two if you don't behave yourself."

"You see, Miss Katie, how I'm abused," sighed the martyred man, as his wife grasped his hair in her small fist. "Once upon a time I was weak enough to promise my wife that in the matter of smoking I would be guided by her, as she got some weird idea, through some old poke of a doctor, that it wasn't good for me. So I promised to try to stop it and being——"

"Being a thoroughly out and out gentleman, he has kept his promise like a man, even though he did make the promise to nobody but his wife," interrupted Madge, softly, the tender light shining in her eyes, proving what a "gentleman" she had always found her liege lord. Jack said "Nonsense!" but the answering light in his face was sweet, indeed, to the wife of five years' standing. This week of quiet was spent by Katie in resting and playing with the twins, while Madge and Jack planned no end of delightful possibilities for the coming four months, at the end of which time it was decided that Katie and the twins were to keep house, while Ma and Pa Wilding went on their annual wedding-trip of a month, a ceremony with which nothing had ever been allowed to interfere.

"Did you know Spencer Sherwood had come back from California?"

"No; are you sure?"

"Well, Ned Herly told me that he saw him yesterday in the town. Shall we have him down for August?"

"Have him down! Well, I should think so. But why not make it July?"

"Can you fit him in? I thought you were full."

"I am, my son, but there are a few things left you to learn, and one is that I can always make room for Spencer Sherwood."

"Even if you have to turn away some one else, I presume."

"Exactly! Even if I have to turn away some one else," replied Madame Madge, serenely.

"Nice thing for a husband to hear. And pray how long has this undying, never-to-be-obliterated-and-all-that-sort of thing affection for Spencer Sherwood been buried in your heart."

"Ever since we made mud pies together and he rescued me from the jaws of an avenging but long suffering calf which I had teased into rebellion."

"My dear, do you mean to assert that that calf would have eaten you up if Spencer Sherwood had not played the part of a devoted knight."

A ringing laugh was Madge's reply.

"Well, no, hardly. But, Jack, it would have knocked me down."

"And if I recollect the circumstance at all, Mrs. Wilding, with all due deference to womanhood even in pinafores, I must say it would have served you most uncommon right," and the gentleman under discussion stepped gaily into the room.

"Hello! old fellow," shouted Jack Wilding.

"It was an awful mean thing, no doubt, to be eavesdropping, but indeed I didn't listen long. I just heard enough to permit me to recognize the calf. That calf had a good many fine points and was likely to be remembered and easily recognized."

"Yes, I remember two especially fine points it had just between its ears," laughed Mrs. Wilding.

"But, bless me! we're so interested in you that we have forgotten to introduce Katie. Miss Rinway—Mr. Sherwood. Now won't we just have a jolly time for the next two or three days before any one else comes," rattled on that talkative little woman, not noticing a very peculiar expression which swept over Sherwood's face as she introduced him to Miss Rinway. Jack noticed it, but the utterly unconscious expression of Katie's face routed the notion that had entered his head that these two had met before.

"I don't think I can stay just now," answered Sherwood, rather confusedly.

"Well, I'd just like to see you go away! Spencer Sherwood; you know perfectly well there isn't one thing to stand in the way of your remaining here for the month of July, and if there is, it shan't stand," spoke up the Brigadier General.

"That settles it, my dear boy! Just give in at once. If you had been married to that young woman for five years, as I have, you would not even have dared to look opposition in the first place."

So Sherwood, with much inward opposition, was induced to remain.

It became evident to all hands, however, that there was something wrong with him in regard to Katie Rinway, and to none was it so apparent as to poor Katie herself.

"Whatever have I done to the man?" asked she of herself. "Nothing! I never saw him before, and yet in these three past days he has managed to impress me most effectually with the fact of his strong disapproval, but as I have never pined for the reverse I don't know as I need care much, though it is somewhat uncomfortable when there are but four of us. And one does not like to be disliked for no cause, even if one doesn't care any thing about it," she added, rather incoherently, it must be confessed.

"It certainly is detestable," Sherwood was saying as she came into the parlor before dinner one evening.

"O, I don't know about its being detestable," answered Jack. "Of course it isn't just the thing, you know, a fellow wouldn't like to see his sister engaged in that kind of thing you know——"

"Or his wife," interpolated Spencer.

"Well I should think not," answered Jack, emphatically, "but I don't think they mean any harm half the time, it is only a little thoughtless fun," he added, charitably. "What do you say, Katie?"

"If I knew what you are talking about, I perhaps would be better able to give an opinion," laughed Katie, little dreaming how much hung upon her reply.

"We were discussing the subject of public flirtations, street flirtations, etc., and Jack, here, feels anxious to know your opinion of any woman who does such things. I confess myself curious to know, also."

There was a certain meaning tone to his voice that made Katie regard him quickly with a vague sense of discomfort, but the expression of his face was inscrutable.

"I agree with Mr. Sherwood, decidedly," she answered, scornfully. "Any woman who could condescend to do such a thing is more than thoughtless."

"Ah, hypocritical as well, eh?" commented Sherwood, mentally.

"Though I do think that some very young girls may be led on to such thing by bad influence, and, as Jack says, the desire for what they falsely call 'fun.'"

"By Jove! she carries it off well," again commented Sherwood, mentally. "Then you think, Miss Rinway, that after a girl is eighteen, she is old enough to know better?" he asked, aloud, in calmly, discursive way, under which lurked the ring of cynicism.

"Most assuredly so," replied Katie, in a tone of such genuine disapprobation that Sherwood was for a moment bewildered.

"Can I be mistaken?" he asked himself. "Isn't she the same girl? She must be, I never could be so mistaken."

Just here dinner was announced, and the subject was dropped. But all through dinner Sherwood was evidently occupied with his own thoughts, which were of a very mixed character, truly.

Dinner over, a sudden resolution seized him. Turning to Katie, he said:

"I am going into the village, will you not walk with me?"

Katie's breath was nearly taken away, but intuition led her to accept. So, off they started, while Jack winked, (yes, I am sorry to record it, but he actually winked) at Madge behind their backs, a performance to which that lady replied with a grimace, which would have sadly distorted most any other face than hers, and a murmured, "Well upon my word! and they fairly seem to detest each other, too."

"All signs fail in dry weather, my dear!" remarked her astute husband.

"I presume you wonder why I asked you to walk to the village this evening, Miss Rinway!" remarked Sherwood, after they had sauntered along in oppressive silence for a quarter of a mile.

"And I presume you wonder why I should have accepted with such alacrity," replied Miss Rinway, question for question. To tell the truth, it had not struck Sherwood in exactly that way, and he found himself a little embarrassed at her direct question in regard to his sentiments on the subject.

"I was very anxious to speak to you about something," he replied, hesitatingly, and very much at a loss for the words which he had thought so ready. "I wanted to talk to you—that's—that's the reason I asked you," he added, lamely.

"O don't mention it," replied Katie, airily, feeling the game in her own hands, and likewise feeling considerable curiosity as to the final result. "I supposed, of course, that there was something important back of this unusual honor," with rather too much emphasis on the word honor to be altogether pleasant.

Spencer was about to make some hot reply, but concluded that discretion was the better part of valor and held his tongue. The more especially as he reflected that he alone had brought it upon himself.

"That conversation, you know, that we had before dinner. You know," he went on.

"Yes?" replied Katie, in that tone of polite inquiry which is so exasperating.

"I didn't see how you could, you know, in the face of the circumstances." He found himself floundering round and gradually sinking, till all this, which he had flattered himself would be so easy, threatened to overwhelm him in disgrace. But it was a very different matter with that girl staring straight at him with those big, clear gray eyes of hers, and he wondered to himself that he had ever imagined he had the requisite courage to attempt it.

"I must say," he broke out, with the courage of desperation, "that you are either an excellent actress or else I am ducedly mistaken.

"Probably both, Mr. Sherwood," responded Katie, serenely.

"But you forget that you have not honored me yet with a very lucid expsition of my fault."

"It's just this. I looked at you this evening as you were talking, and wondered that any woman could be such a hypocrite."

"You are nothing if not charmingly candid, Mr. Sherwood," responed Kittie, flushing and biting her lips with vexation, adding, impatiently, "I do wish to goodness, Mr. Sherwood, you would say out what you mean."

He hesitated, then made a plunge:

"Let me tell you a little story, Miss Rinway. One day I was riding in the cars quite a distance. Sitting in front of me was what I considered a very pleasant-faced young woman. I could see her profile very well, for she kept her face turned towards the window, but I did not think she noticed me, especially; in fact, I did not think she noticed me at all. But after a while she took out her pencil" (here he gazed searchingly at Kittie's face, on which was expressed only curiosity, combined with wonder, as to his motive in telling her all this) "and some paper, and suddenly there fell into my lap a no e——"

"Well?" questioned Kittie, as he paused impressively, as one who has made a hit.

"Upon the slip of paper was written:

"'I would like to become better acquainted.'

"And yet, to-night, you would condemn, utterly and entirely, a girl who would get up a street flirtation."

A look of dawning intelligence, a suffusion of color and then, spite of the discomfort of the situation, a ringing laugh.

"O, Mr. Sherwood! it is too funny! Do let me sit down on this stump and recover. I admit, I do admit, that circumstantial evidence is very strongly against me. But wait a minute. Have you that slip of paper about you?" Sherwood produced it. "Now see here," and she quickly wrote the same sentence upon the back of an envelope "Does my writing look any thing like that?"

Sherwood was forced to admit that there was not the faintest resemblance.

"Then how do you account for it?"

Sherwood was forced again to admit that he couldn't account for it, and, further than that, he began to be aware that he was in a decidedly awkward and uncomfortable position.

"I can only imagine that you are the wrong girl, but the resemblance is marvelous—marvelous."

"It will be still more marvelous when I tell you that I am the same girl, but, that to my knowledge, I never saw you before that day I met you in Madge's dining room."

"Then you never saw that piece of paper before?"

"O, yes, I did."

"Then it was you who threw it to me."

"O, no, I didn't."

"What did you do then?" he asked, helplessly.

Then the whole story came out.

"But," added she, "I do not at all know how it came into your lap, for I threw it out of the window."

"The wind must have carried it out of your window into mine. But, seeing you with your pencil, and suddenly finding myself in possession of a note flung from somewhere in front of me, it was natural for me to think you threw it, wasn't it?" he said, dejectedly and pleadingly.

But Katie resented this inference.

However, they must have fixed it up some way between them, for Katie wears a large diamond which Jack has begged her to cover up with a glove finger, for fear it will strike him blind with its rays.

And Spencer Sherwood has only just gone away (and all that happened two months and a half ago), and Katie has written to her employer that she will not teach any more. So it seems pretty patent that there is a wedding imminent—that is, if there is any thing in "Circumstantial Evidence."—Mrs. Emma C. Hewitt, in Yankee Blade.

A Remarkable Texas Plateau.

This celebrated plateau, comprising about ten acres, and rising sixty feet above the surrounding prairie, and ninety feet above the level of the sea, lies six miles northwest of Columbia. It is covered by a fertile soil, with a red clay foundation, resting upon a substratum of shale, which is richly charged with sulphate of iron, magnesia, lime and other salts usually found in mineral waters emerging from slates. This shale, disintegrated in water and steeped, possesses medicinal properties of great value. A yet lower stratum consists of a compact limestone, yielding a good quality of lime. There is but little doubt that the mound is of seismic origin. Deep crevices abound penetrating it would seem, into the very bowels of the earth, as a stone dropped in can be heard striking against the ledges of rock until the reverberations are lost in the mysterious depths below.—Old Capitol.

ODD EXPRESSIONS.

An Amusing Collection of Verbal Bulls and Blunders.

Curious ways of expressing ideas in English may be expected from foreigners, as, for instance, when the Frenchman, who paid a call in this country and was about to be introduced to a family, said: "Ah, ze ladies! Zen I vould before, if you please, vish to purify mine hands and to sweep mine hair!"

But the various nationalities of the British isles are sometimes not a whit behind in verbal bulls and blunders and in what may generally be described as odd ways of putting things. It is said that when Constable's aunt was dying the good, deaf old lady said: "Anne, if I should be spared to be taken away, I hope my nephew will get the doctor to open my head and see if any thing can be done for my hearing."

A Scotch publican was complaining of his servant-maid that she could never be found when required: "She'll gang oot o' the house," said he, "twenty times for once she'll come in."

A Welsh landlord who for some time had been annoyed by an obstreperous guest, walked across the room to him and striking the table with his fist, shouted very volubly: "You haf kick up a row all day ere to-night! We was not interfere with you, do we? Efery man here mind his own piziness; yes, by Jink, no."

The beggar was verbally mixed who thus accosted a passer-by: "Sir, would you please give me a little money to buy a bit of bread, for I'm so dreadfully thirsty that I don't know where I am to get a night's lodging?"

The same may be said of a country yokel who went to the menagerie to examine the wild beasts. Several gentleman expressed the opinion that the orange-outang was a lower order of the human species. Hodge did not like this idea, and striding up to the gentleman expressed his contempt for it in these words: "Pooh! he's no more of the human species than I be."

"Mamma, is that a spoiled child?" asked a little boy on seeing a negro baby for the first time.

An amusing announcement was issued by a corn-cutter from Leige: "They extaret the corns vidout the litest pain. Cut nales, deformed vitch spreds in the fleisch—by a new methode vidout pain. They spokes French, Anglish, Italien, Spanitch, Portogeese, Dutch and Garman vid equal fluency and rites dem."

Over a bridge in Georgia is the following: "Any person driving over this bridge in a pace faster than a walk shall, if a white man, be fined five dollars, and if a negro receive twenty-five lashes, half the penalty to be bestowed on the informer."

In a small town near Avignon the houses in the suburbs became flooded up to the level of the first floor. An enterprising resident distributed among his neighbors the following card: "M. Brochet, professor of swimming, is prepared to give lessons at the pupil's residence," The professor may be said to have taken fortune at the flood.

A shop exhibits a card warning every body against unscrupulous persons "who infringe our title to deceive the public." We are afraid the shopman does not say quite what he means any more than the proprietor of an eating-house near the docks, on the door of which may be read the following announcement, conveying fearful intelligence to the gallant tars who frequent this port: "Sailors' vitals cooked here."

A boarding-house keeper announces in one of the newspapers that he has a cottage to let containing eight rooms and an acre of land. A dealer in cheap shoes was equally ambiguous when he counseled in one of his advertisements: "Ladies wishing these cheap shoes will do well to call soon, as they will not last long." The same may be said of the following: "This hotel will be kept by the widow of the former landlord, who died last summer on a new and improved plan."

A Scottish blacksmith, being asked the meaning of metaphysics, replied: "When the party wha listens disna ken what the party wha speaks disna ken what he means himsel'—that's metaphoesics."

Perhaps as odd a way of putting things as any of the foregoing examples was furnished by a little Parisian mendicant, who, following a gentleman, said: "Monsieur, give me just a penny; I'm an orphan by birth." The definition was worth ten centin to her.—London Spectator.

Cremate Your Love Letters.

Lovers' letters are usually treasured up as something too precious and sacred to cast into the fire. But into the fire they ought to go, every one of them. They are proverbially sweet, sickening sweet, and silly to every body but the twain interested. They have no earthly value for others. And when true love does not run smooth, as so often happens, and the letters are read in the divorce court, or as the foundation for damages for wasted affections, in what depths of mortified vanity, impotent rage and helpless ridicule are poor lovers plunged. When the adored one writes to his angel, if she be gifted with mortal prudence, and if she really and truly love her Charles she will destroy his letter after reading it twice and kissing it three times. So also will Charles treat the missive of Angelina if he be worldly-wise. But lovers seldom or never are worldly-wise, and behold how the world is continually laughing at their unburned folly.—Philadelphia Record.

SOME SAXON CUSTOMS.

How Our Remote Ancestors Ate, Drank and Transferred Real Estate.

It seems somewhat paradoxical, perhaps, to use the term table manners about a people who had no tables strictly speaking, but a board that, when required, was brought out from its place of storage and placed upon trestles, and on this, after covering with a piece of carpet or tapestry, the meal was placed. From this source comes our word "boarder;" one who sits at our board to eat, but who is not of the family.

The salt-cellar was the most important article upon the table. It was very large, made with a cover and, when the host could afford it, was of solid silver elaborately chased. It occupied the place of honor on the table, and the most distinguished guests sat above it. Thus "to sit below the salt" shows the position of an inferior.

The meats were brought in on spits, just as they were cooked, and in that way passed around by the servants to the guests, who in the more barbarous times tore off a portion as best they could. When they were a little further advanced in civilization there was a carver who held the meat in one hand while he cut with the other. The guests helped themselves, using their hands, throwing the bones and refuse to the dogs and cats, of which there was a goodly number, and which scrambled for their share among the rushes. A few had knives shaped like razors, but forks were unknown. Even the great Elizabeth ate with her fingers. In her reign, however, commerce was extended and luxuries began to appear; porcelains and glasses to drink from instead of pewter mugs. In her bath-room she had mirrors, and this was considered a great extravagance.

At first, two persons ate from one "trencher." These trenchers were nothing more than a huge slice of bread. Two qualities of bread were made; one fine, to be eaten; the other of coarse, inferior flour, which was cut in substantial slices and used as plates. After the meal was ended, if the guest or member of the family was unusually hungry he was at liberty to eat his plate, which was found to be quite palatable in consequence of having soaked up the gravy; if he did not choose to devour it, it was placed in the alms-basket, which was always to be found in the dining hall and into which was gathered the broken food and sent out to the poor, waiting at the gate.

When plates first came into use the rich provided themselves with handsome silver ones, while the poorer classes had to be content with those made of pewter or wood.

Every one had his drinking horn or cup. Usually it was a horn elaborately carved and ornamented with gold and silver and considered a very valuable article among a man's possessions. The drinking horn was often left by will, as in later times people bequeathed snuff boxes and as now they might dispose of a valuable watch or diamond ring.

In the transfer of land, before the custom of witnessing by seal was introduced, the owner gave something in pledge as an assurance or token of the contract, and in such cases it was not uncommon to make use of the drinking horn for this purpose. One family held their estate from Canute by his drinking horn. This was their sole proof. One can get from this fact an idea of the value which was attached to this article of personal property. Probably the expression "taking a horn" could be traced back to the use of this form of drinking utensil, for they were so fashioned, as were the first drinking glasses also, that they could not be placed in an upright position, therefore it became necessary as soon as they were filled to swallow their contents at once. From their propensity to tumble over is said to have come our word "tumbler," as applied to a drinking glass.—Louise Phillips, in Current.

MRS. STOWE'S "YARBS."

An Amusing Anecdote of the Authoress of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Mrs. Stowe's daily life is much the same as that of any other old lady of her quiet tastes. She is very fond of taking long walks when the weather is fine in the fields and byways on the outskirts of the city. She wanders around alone and her slight figure is a familiar one to most of the old residents of Hartford. A rather funny incident happened as she was strolling the fields one day last summer picking flowers. On one of the low hills lying in the vicinity of Hartford's famous cemetery has lived for over sixty years a man by the name of Dix. Mr. Dix is now approaching his eightieth year, but is a hearty, well-preserved old gentleman, and is extremely proud of the fact that he is the father of several generations of children and grandchildren. Old Mr. Dix was picking "yarbs," as he calls them, one afternoon in a field near his house. I will let him tell the rest in his own words:

"I was picking some yarbs in the field when all of a suddint I heard some one say: 'Old man, what are you picking them yarbs for?' I looked up, and jist over the stun wall I see the funniest looking little woman I ever laid eyes on, kinder simple looking, too. I told her I was getting the yarbs for rheumatiz. Then she asked me my name. I told her my name, and said I had lived in the little house on the hill for nigh on to sixty years. Then I said:

"'What may your name be, marm?'

"'O,' she said, 'my name is Harriet Beecher Stowe.'

"Wall you could have knocked me down with a feather. I was never more dumfounded in my life. There I'd been taking that woman for er fool."—Hartford Letter in Brooklyn Eagle.

—Electricity on railroads will surely not be long in coming. We are at the eve of greater changes than we have yet seen. The New York street car lines are experimenting with a promise of immediate action. The "Julien system," at present, meets with most favor. In Europe electric lines are a decided success on a small scale.

—Since the first appearance of the great red spot on the planet Jupiter some nine years ago, Mr. W. F. He believes the red spot to be a feature of Jupiter's atmosphere, and not of the surface of the planet.

—It still seems to be an unsettled question whether wood can be ignited by the heat of steam pipe in contact with it. It is admitted, theoretically, that it is impossible for wood to take fire at a temperature of 212 degrees, or somewhat higher; but it is well known that there have been a large number of cases of fire reported as occuring from this cause, and the evidence is very conflicting.

—According to Besnier, leprosy is spreading rapidly. Since the extension of the French colonial possessions, soldiers, sailors, traders and missionaries have fallen victims to it in large numbers. Besnier, therefore, exhorts physicians in all countries to study the fell disease in order to find means of counteracting its ravages, for it has active focuses of infection in every part of the globe.

—An electrical heating stove, invented in France, presents some interesting points of arrangement and operation. In it the conducting wires are led through apertures in plates of refractory clay and plumbago, and in which wire bobbins are placed as part of the electric circuit. To carry out this plan the bobbins are heated by the passage of the current, and in turn heat the air, which is allowed to pass freely through the apparatus.

—Scientists are asked to tell why land that has been densely shaded, or protected from the sun by piles of lumber, brick, wood, stone or any thing else, for a few years, always becomes richer than adjacent land that has not been thus shaded or protected. It is alleged that a great number of facts have been collected showing that there is no doubt of the enrichment of land thus protected from the sun for any considerable period of time, but that no explanation of the phenomenon has yet been reached.

VATICAN ETIQUETTE.

How the Pope Entertains Princes and Other Important Personages.

The etiquette of the Vatican requires that the Pope shall dine alone, and while eating he reads the newspapers. When he wishes to show especial honor to a foreign Prince or to any personage of importance, he invites him to take a cup of coffee with him after the morning mass. On such occasions the guest is expected to attend the first mass and to receive the communion from the Pope's hands. The visitor, however, does not sit at the same table with his Holiness, but a smaller one alongside of him. Among those recently honored in this way were Don Carlos, the Spanish pretender, on the occasion of his son's confirmation, the Grand Duchess of Tuscany, the Prince Borghesa, Aldobrandini, Altievi and Pombino, while the same favor is often shown to the Pope's nephews. Cardinal Pecci used to live in the Vatican, and he frequently visited his brother while the latter was eating dinner.

Dinner is served at one o'clock, the usual hour in Rome for that meal. This repast consists of soup, a dish of roast meat and vegetables, fruit and some old Bordeaux wine. No boiled meats or pork in any form or cheese is ever seen on the table.

The meal ended, his Holiness indulges in a nap of an hour's length while seated in a large arm-chair; then, weather permitting, he goes for a walk in the gardens, accompanied by one of his private chamberlains and a Lieutenant of the Papal Guards. His carriage is also in attendance, so that he can ride when overfatigued by walking. His Holiness still considers himself a prisoner, and never leaves the precincts of the Vatican; but the gardens of that palace are very extensive, the main drive measuring quite a mile in length. At one end of the park is a vineyard, cultivated by the children of an agricultural orphanage that was founded by Pius IX., and named after him the Vinga Pia. Leo XIII. often visits the vineyard, and whenever he notices one of the boys doing his work intelligently he stops to have a chat. He takes much interest in agricultural matters, and is well posted in botany.—Rome Letter.

FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

A LOST WORD.

I lost a very little word
  Only the other day;
A very naughty little word
  I had not meant to say.
If only it were really lost,
  I should not mind a bit;
I think I should deserve a prize
  For really losing it.

For if no one could ever find
  Again that little word,
So that no more from any lips
  Could it be ever heard,
I'm sure we all of us should say
  That it was some thing fine
With such completeness to have lost
  That naughty word of mine.

But then it really wasn't lost
  When from my lips it flew;
My little brother picked it up,
  And now he says it, too.
Mamma said that the worst would be
  I could not get it back;
But the worst of it now seems to me
  I'm always on its track.

Mamma is sad, papa looks grieved;
  Johnny has said it twice;
Of course it is no use for me
  To tell him it's not nice,
When you lose other things, they're lost;
  But lose a naughty word,
And for every time 'twas heard before
  Now twenty times 'tis heard.

If it were only really lost!
  O, then I should be glad
I let it fall so carelessly
  The day that I got mad.
Lose other things, you never seem
  To come upon their track;
But lose a naughty little word,
  It's always coming back.

A SERMON FOR BOYS.

In-Door and Out-Door Work and Recreation—The Boys Who Prove the Winners in the Contests of Manhood—A Doctor's Views.

One morning, some years ago, I walked with Dr. Phillips Brooks from the play-ground of St. Paul's school to the chapel, where I heard him preach, to the boys, a great sermon, seventeen minutes long.

The text was: "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." The man who is not at times a boy is not much of a man. As for my preacher friend he has always hovered on the verge of boyhood, and his sermon showed how friendly to boys his large inclusiveness enabled him to be. He said that all relations in life are like tax-gatherers, and should have their dues. A boy, he said, has duties to God, to his country, to his school, to himself.

The thought of a boy's duties to himself brought back to memory the text which is strong enough to be the seed of many sermons of many kinds.

The duties now referred to are not such as the preacher meant, or not altogether these. I am speaking now as a doctor, to boys old enough to think, and shall leave to others to say how much boys should study; nor shall I, least of all men, advise them against hard, mental work in youth, because I think that a regular, steady use of the brain makes all the mental labor of manhood more easy.

But this conviction is not inconsistent with a hearty appreciation of a scrimmage at foot-ball, nor with that sturdy feeling of the boys, that the games which are without risks are poor things. For they are deficient in the qualities which make boyhood games useful for training youth in courage, self-control, discipline, calmness and general suppression of emotion, and that it is this training which gives value to cricket, base-ball and foot-ball.

In spite of games, gymnasiums and the increased knowledge which the men of this generation have of the laws of health, one still sees many sick young folks. Some of the ills to be observed are incidents of life, some are its accidents, and come down from the sins or follies of grandparents; but, many are due to causes which sadden us to think about, and cause one to long for more city play-grounds, and to wish to make wood-Arabs for a summer month of some of these little fellows deprived of the rights of childhood.

In the richer classes of life, where the chances for health are better, they are lessened too often, because boys are stupid and do not enjoy fitly the noble citizenship of boyhood, or because parents are inert, or lack insight. It is mostly among this class, the easy class, that we see the weakly boys, tallow-colored and sluggish, who struggle along and are more and more damaged because they do not like sports or dread to compete with their fearless comrades. Every school-boy knows all the varieties of this kind; the weakling who reads and reads, good books or poor, but does nothing else; the fellow who studies, and finds no time for play; the merely accumulative boy who collects, but has no joy in the search.

Last week I asked a pasty-faced lad what game he liked best. He said: "Collecting postage-stamps." Then he volunteered the remark that his bro her had a splendid collection of eggs, but that these were all bought from other boys. He had never found an egg for himself.

The boy who collected postage-stamps had dyspepsia, and it was said that he liked to play croquet. These are the business boys. If I live until that fellow is fifty years, which is improbable, he will come to me with a large liver, having cleverly become rich, and, in getting money, forgotten its uses.

The out-of-door boys do not greatly enrich the doctor, and escape many of the ills which beset the lazy. It is odd how rare are certain disorders among boys in the country, where fellows must be out-of-doors so much. Every spring I have a good crop of young patients, flabby lads, with mushy muscles, who twitch and squirm and drop things and wink at you wildly and are getting St Vitus' dance. It is apt to be an in-door boy who falls a prey to this saint, and the country lad seldom gets into his clutches.

There is another kind of boy who should live out-of-doors. He is the timid, emotional, merely nervous boy, apt to be labeled "girl-boy." Fine temperaments fall to these lads often, and none are more easily misunderstood. The fellow will not fight; all risks appal him. If in the water, he likes to feel bottom. He has a good chance of going to pieces early; but if he lives he comes to something, and only needed kindly help to have given him in youth the sturdiness he misses so much in later life.

I will recall two such fellows. We used to try to make them fight one another. It was like a battle between two doves. One grew to be a gallant Major-General in our great war, and the other became a resolute and fearless guerilla soldier in the wildest fighting on the Kansas line in that great strife.

What did Wordsworth mean about the child being the "father of the man?" Character is often a question of health. Out-of-doors is a great steadier of nerves, and these lads should get it early and in large doses. If wars were fought in-doors, everybody would run away at once.

I rode once through the Yellowstone and across Montana in days when Sitting Bull was a name of fear, and the common, daily risks of travel were serious enough. A bad ford was our first experience, and my saddle turned an hour later on a rocky path in a canyon eight hundred feet deep. I decline to say how scared I was; but a week later we were all of us more or less indifferent to danger. It was worth while to go into the woods once a year to get made over again in this fashion, and "kind of feel yourself persimmoned up a bit," as my guide Dan Harington used to say, when we floated together down the swift Allegash.

Among the indoor boys are often good scholars, who lead their classes, and at college take honors, and then some fine day merely stop living for want of good stomachs or sound hearts. It seems as if some of them were wound up to run just so long and no longer.

But suppose that they go through, and come to the bar, or get to the nobler position of physician, and are looked to as the successes of the future. Then something happens, and the man ceases to live. Meanwhile some young scamp who spent his youth in the manufacture of legs, and took honors at base-ball, picks up the peach the other fellow let fall, and goes on comfortably munching it, with health for a partner, having illustrated the fact that life is essential to success.

What I want to say to the boy who merely studies or reads, and does not also play, is that plenty of men win in life who never did much with their heads in youth; but, that, as a rule, the great winners in the contest of manhood must have healthy bodies, and that youth is the season for play.

Very often it is not the boy's fault that he has no out-door life and no taste for it. The father, a lucky merchant or manufacturer, proud of a clever lad, sets him to work early, and sees with joy his eager ambition. College life the father looks upon as time lost, as four years given to games and the learning of what makes no man materially richer. At last, years after, the lad grown old, and broken in the dull monotony of successful trade, comes to me or to some one and says: "I am rich, I am wretched, what shall I do?"

I answer: "Go and shoot ducks, lure trout, kill salmon, ride a horse." He has neither vigor nor enterprise to do any of these things. As to travel and pictures, books and music, he lacketh custom of liking. He has been forty years in trade-prison, and being driven out of a sudden, knows not what to do. The gentle art of being pleasantly idle, he can never know. I have not yet learned what to say to that man.—S. Weir Mitchell, M. D., in Youth's Companion.

A Good Motto.

The first experience of a millionaire merchant in Philadelphia on his arrival in this country aptly illustrates what push can accomplish. When he stepped ashore from the sailing vessel, he said: 'I was without money or friends. I spoke to a man on the wharf, and asked him what to do. He replied: 'Work, young man. Have you any motto?' 'No,' I said. 'What do you mean?' He said: 'Every man must have a motto. Now think of one. Go out and hunt for work.

"I started thinking of a motto. As I walked along the street I saw painted on a door the word 'Push.' I said: 'That shall be my motto.' I did push at the door, and entered an office. I was asked what I wanted. I said: 'Work; and the word on your door gave me not only a motto, but confidence.'

"My manner pleased the man. He asked me many questions, all of which were answered promptly. He said at last: 'I want a boy of 'push,' and as you have adopted that for your motto, I will try you.'

"He did. My success followed, and the motto that made my fortune will make that of others."

The word is old, short and crisp, but it expresses every thing, and has carved out fortune and fame for hundreds of thousands of poor and obscure boys.—Dry Goods Chronicle.

Energy and Pluck.

Who of us is not aroused to sympathy when we see a child deprived of any of its powers? But a boy in Maine has taught us that pluck, energy and perseverance will enable even one whose physical powers are limited to accomplish a man's part in the world. A boy living on his father's farm near Troy, Me., was sick and lame, and it was considered that he could be of no use on the farm. One day he saw a sheep buyer pay his father three dollars for lambs. The boy made up his mind that he could buy lambs for two dollars and a half. He borrowed one hundred dollars of his father and started off on foot, buying lambs throughout the entire region. In five months he cleared five hundred dollars, and to-day I. C. Libby is known as "The Maine Cattle King."—Christian Union.

Nervousness, Weakness, Nervous Debility, Nervous and Physical Exhaustion, Nervous Prostration, Sleeplessness, Dyspepsia, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Pains in Side and Back, Hysteria, Epileptic Fits, St. Vitus's Dance, Palpitation, Nervous and Sick Headache, Tired Feeling, Malaria, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Loss of Appetite, Constipation, Biliousness, Kidney and Liver Diseases, Etc.

Weak and Nervous.

These are the feelings of which so many complain. They are weak, tired and exhausted; they have no appetite, no strength, no life or ambition to work; they become irritable, cross, blue and discouraged; some cases there are pains and aches in various parts of the body and there is often indigestion, dyspepsia, gas, dull head and general dispirited feeling.

RESTLESS AND SLEEPLESS NIGHTS. Sleepless, restless and wakeful nights follow. Neglect of these symptoms results in excessive nervous prostration or paralysis, with numbness, trembling, cold feet and legs, prickling sensation and weakness and weariness of the limbs. Thousands become prostrated, paralyzed or insane by neglecting the first symptoms, not knowing that the nervous irritability, gloom of the mind, loss of memory, nervous weakness and depression show MENTAL DEPRESSION AND INSANITY. PROSTRATION AND PARALYSIS. an exhaustion of nerve force which will, unless the proper restorative remedy is used, result in utter mental collapse and absolute prostration of nerve and physical power. Save yourselves from these terrible results while there is yet time by the use of that wonderful nerve invigorator and health restorer, DR. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC. It is a purely vegetable remedy, and may be used by children or the most delicate invalids with absolute certainty of cure. Its effects are truly wonderful, and it is only necessary to use it to be convinced of its marvelous restorative and strength-giving powers. It IS A GUARANTEED CURE. is an absolute specific for nervous debility and physical exhaustion. Persons with weakened nerves and exhausted vitality can regain their strength and vigor by its use. Do not fail to use this remedy, which is the greatest medical discovery of the century, and an absolutely certain cure will result. All druggists keep it. Price, $1 per bottle. Be sure and get DR. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC; take no other, for this remedy has no equal. If your druggist does not have it, he will get it for you. Its discoverer, DR. GREENE, 35 West 14th Street, New York, the great specialist in curing nervous and chronic diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter. ☞USE HIS GREAT REMEDY AND WRITE HIM ABOUT YOUR CASE.

WILBOR'S COMPOUND OF PURE COD LIVER OIL AND PHOSPHATES OF LIME, SODA, IRON.

Cures COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, DEBILITY, WASTING DISEASES, and all SCROFULOUS HUMORS.

Almost as palatable as cream. It can be taken with pleasure by delicate persons and children, who, after using it, are very fond of it. It assimilates with the food, increases the flesh and appetite, builds up the nervous system, restores energy to mind and body, creates new, rich and pure blood, in fact, rejuvenates the whole system.

FLESH, BLOOD, NERVE, BRAIN.

This preparation is far superior to all other preparations of Cod-Liver Oil; it has many imitators, but no equals. The results following its use are its best recommendations. Be sure, as you value your health, and get the genuine. Manufactured only by Dr. ALEX. B. Wilbor, Chemist, Boston, Mass. What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces unsightly lumps or swellings; which causes painful running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or the many other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors." It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the worst possible features of both. Being the most ancient, it is the most general of all diseases or affections, for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished, often when other medicines have failed, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. Some of these cures are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial. Send for book of cures.

$10 REAL VALUE FREE!

Our new stamping outfit is free to every reader of this publication; it contains 100 perforated stamping patterns and includes a great variety of all sizes that are wanted. This outfit is a real work of art; no stamping outfit has ever been offered heretofore, on which anything like so much artistic ability was brought to bear. With each outfit is a BOX OF BEST STAMPING POWDER, PAD, AND BOOK of INSTRUCTIONS, giving full directions for stamping, tells how to make the powder and stamping paint, contains instructions for Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting, tells colors to use in painting—red, white, blue, yellow, pink and other flowers; also contains hints and instructions on other matters, too numerous to mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, the equal of the above would cost $10. Although it is free, yet this is the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits and on every hand is acknowledged to be superior, yes, very much superior, and very much more desirable than those which have been selling for $1 each and upwards. By having 200,000 of these outfits made for us, during the dull season, we got them at first cost; the manufacturer was glad to take the order, at cost, that his help might be kept at work. All may depend that it is the very best, most artistic and in every way desirable outfit ever put before the public. Farm and Housekeeper (monthly, 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year) is generally acknowledged to be the best general agricultural, housekeeping and family journal in America; it is entertaining and of great interest, as well as useful; its contributors embrace the widest range of brilliant talent. Furthermore, we have lately become managing owners of that grand monthly, Sunshine, for youth; also, for those of all ages whose hearts are not withered; 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year. Sunshine is known favorably as the best youth's monthly in America. The best writers for youth, in the world, are its regular contributors; it is now quoted all over the world as standing at the head. Both papers are splendidly illustrated by the best artists. We will take 250,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a moderate portion of the cost.

FREE! Furthermore, every trial year subscriber, for either of the papers will receive Free by mail our new 900 pattern Stamping Outfit. Trial year subscriptions will be received for either of the papers as follows: 1 subscription and 1 outfit, 32 cents; 2 subscriptions and 2 outfits, if sent at one time, 55 cents; 4 subscriptions and 4 outfits, if sent at one time, $1. For 5¢ send a dollar bill, but for less, send 1 cent postage stamps. Better at once get three friends to join you, at 25 cents each; you can do it in a few minutes and they will thank you; papers will be mailed regularly to their separate addresses. While trial year subscribers are served for much less than cost, it proves the rule that a very large proportion of all who read either paper for a year, want it thereafter, and are willing to pay the regular price of 75 cents a year; through this, as time rolls on, we reap a profit that satisfies us.

FREE! The trial year subscriptions are almost free, and this the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits—the best ever known—is entirely free. It is the greatest and best offer ever made to the public. Large sizes of patterns—every size that can be desired is included; all other outfits surpassed, by this, the best, the most artistic, the Regal Queen. Below we give a list of a few of the patterns; space is too valuable to admit of naming all: 1 Poppies for Scarf; 2 Tidy; 3 Tidy design; 4 Golden Rod, 6 inch; 5 Pond Lilies; 6 Pansies; 7 Moss Rose Bud; 8 Tube Roses; 9 Wheat; 10 Bulrushes; 11 Maiden Hair Fern; 12 Boy; 13 Girl's Head; 14 Bird; 15 Strawberries; 16 Owl; 17 Dog; 18 Butterfly; 19 Apple Blossoms; 20 Calla Lily; 21 Acorns; 22 Morning Glories; 23 Japanese Lilies; 24 Rabbit; 25 Daisies; 26 Forget-me-nots; 27 Fuchsias; 27 Bell Drops; 28 Fan; 29 Clover; 30 Cat's Head. 70 other splendid patterns are included in this Regal Queen of stamping outfits—in all 100 patterns. Safe delivery guaranteed. Possessing this outfit any lady can, without expense, make home beautiful in many ways, make embroider children and ladies clothing in the most fashionable manner, and readily make money by doing stamping, Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting for others. A good stamping outfit is indispensable to every woman who cares to make home beautiful. This outfit contains patterns for each and every branch of needle work, flower painting, etc., and the Book of Instructions makes all clear and easily learned. The outfit will do more for HOME and LADIES than many times the amount of a trial year subscription spent otherwise; no home should be with out it. The beautiful designs of this QUEEN OF outfits ARE ALL THE RAGE wherever seen; when ever one or two reach a locality their fame spreads, and many TRIAL YEAR subscriptions usually follow. Many who have paid from $1 to $2 for outfits and were satisfied until they saw our designs, have secured our outfit and laid aside forever the others. Those who subscribe will find the papers well worth several times the trifling cost of a trial year subscription, and the majority will make up to us the loss, that this year we incur, through such a low price, by continuing subscribers, year after year, at the regular price, which all will be willing to submit to low enough. The money will gladly be refunded to any one who is not fully satisfied. Address,

SATURDAY, FEB. 25, 1888.

A cyclone struck Mount Vernon, Ill., Sunday and nearly destroyed the town. Twenty-seven dead bodies have been taken from the ruins and two hundred and fifty are injured and missing.

We invite all honest temperance people to give a careful perusal to the speech of Dr. H. K. Carroll, editor of the New York Independent, which we reprint in another column, Every fair minded man must admit the force of the arguments which Dr. Carroll makes against the methods of the third party.

The anti-saloon Republican national committee has issued a call for a national conference to be held in New York on April 18 and 19 next. Its purpose is stated to be, "to assure and signalize the complete withdrawal of the national Republican party from all complicity with the saloon infamy, and to emphasize its positive antagonism thereto."

The following letter from "Cumming Nye," in the New York Tribune of February 7, contains so much graphic history in a short space that we herewith give it in full:

If Mr. Cleveland had ever read the history of the United States, he would probably not have written such a message as that which he laid before congress last fall. From the day that he entered upon the office of president, it was perfectly evident that his one controlling purpose in all that he did was to get himself nominated and elected for a second term. The peculiar composition of his cabinet announced this policy, which up to the time of the message of December, 1887, was followed steadily and unflinchingly. The message marks a point at which he was compelled to make a choice and take one of two risks, and apparently his ignorance of American history has led him to choose the greater risk.

For half a century no presidential nominee of the Democratic party, whether elected or not, has been renominated, and the last one to be renominated (Martin Van Buren, in 1840) was defeated by the same opponent whom he had defeated four years previously. The reason is that they have all, or nearly all, been made scapegoats. And this applies not only to those who were elected as Democrats, but also to three that were elected vice-president by the other party but on succeeding to the presidency practically went over to the Democracy. In every case they have been used to further the purposes of the extremists in the party, and the party has then thrown them overboard to escape the popular odium of their acts. James K. Polk, who was president during the Mexican war, which was brought on by the extremist of his party for the purpose of extending slavery territory, was one of the youngest of our presidents, and had done everything that his party required him to do, but he was not renominated. Millard Filmore, who went over to the Democrats and signed the fugivitive slave law in 1850, did not receive their nomination in 1852. Franklin Pierce, who used all the power of the general government to crowd free labor out of Kansas, in obedience to the Democratic demand for still more slave territory, was not renominated. His successor, James Buchanan, who continued his Kansas policy and vetoed the homestead bill when northern Democratic congressmen no longer dared to vote against it, was not renominated, though no candidate had ever so thoroughly identified himself with the platform of his party. Andrew Johnson, originally a Democrat, had not been president very long when he returned to that party and did all that he possibly could for it, obstinately opposing congress to the last. But the Democratic convention of 1868 did not nominate him for re-election.

In each of these cases the man was used by the extremists of the party, and when he had done their work he was cast over that the party might escape the loss of votes that would result if it tried to carry him. The present extremists of the Democratic party are the free traders, who constitute its most aggressive element and they appear to have put Mr. Cleveland to the old familiar scapegoat use. What a pity that he had never acquired enough of the reading habit to enable him to find out what became of his predecessors!

THIRD-PARTYISM.

Its Bearing Upon the Cause of Temperance Reform.

Under the auspices of the Prohibition party a discussion of the subject whether temperance reform requires a national prohibition party was held in the Brooklyn academy of music on Thursday evening, February 2. The chosen advocate of the Prohibitionists was Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, lately their candidate for governor of New Jersey. The other side of the question was supported by Dr. H. K. Carroll, of the Independent. After referring to the magnitude of the task of overthrowing the saloon, he said:

But, gentlemen of the Prohibition party, you have not hesitated to plan for yourselves additional or preliminary tasks which to everybody but you, must seem hopeless—I mean the destruction, practically, of the two old parties. You cannot grapple with the saloon until you have political power; you cannot have political power until you can wrest it from the old parties. To be the first, instead of the third party, you must practically destroy the Republican party in the north and the Democratic party of the south. [Applause.] Let me remind you that old-established parties, like the Democratic and Republican, are not often or easily killed, You all remember at the close of the civil war the feeling was quite general that the Democratic party had reached the end of its history. It had espoused the cause of slavery, it had waged a bitter and bloody war against the Union and the constitution; and, when the rebellion was put down, men said that the Democratic party fell with the confederacy, and that its name and organization and principles must never be resurrected. That was less than twenty-five years ago. Where is that party to-day—lost in the history of the fast-moldering past? Nay; but in the full vigor of life and power, holding the reins of the national government. If slavery and treason and rebellion will not kill a party, what have you, gentlemen, that is more effectual? [Applause.]

But you say the Republican party is doomed, also. The grand old party must go. It has done glorious things; its record is without taint of treason; it saved the country; it broke forever the bonds of the slave; it restored the Union; it brought back peace and prosperity to our distracted nation; it is the party of Lincoln and Summer and Grant and Garfield. [Applause.] Do you think that if wickedness could not kill the Democratic, virtue will make the Republican party an easy prey? [Applause.]

You expect to succeed by detaching the better element from these old parties and attaching it to your own. You must wreck and rob these old parties, so to speak, in order to equip your own. You assume that it will never occur to the veterans who man the old ship to protect themselves from the attacks of your little canoe. It does not seem to occur to you that the Republican party in the north may be wise enough and strong enough to circumvent your plans and resist your attacks. It does not seem to occur to you that both of these old parties must be credited at least with the instinct of self-preservation. And is it not perfectly plain that, possessing this instinct, which belongs to everything that has life. both the old parties will know how to protect themselves when the danger becomes manifest.

The temperance movement was not born with your organization. There was prohibition in force before you named your first presidential candidate; and all the recent magnificent advance in temperance legislation was not only not due to your influence; it was, in some cases, despite your influence. What reasonable prospect have you that you will come into political power by fighting and destroying the old parties? Not the slightest. [Applause.]

But you say you have a strong hope grounded in the history of political anti-slavery; and that as slavery was abolished by a special party, growing out of the little Liberty of 1840 to the mighty Republican party of 1860, so prohibition will triumph by your party. But, unfortunately for you, the analogy breaks down at the citical points. Neither of the two political parties of those days was willing to do anything to oppose or restrict slavery. In no state did either the Whig or Democratic party make any attempt to abolish slavery. The relation of the old parties to prohibition is as different as possible. There is hardly a state, north or south, in which the one or the other of the old parties has not adopted restrictive or prohibitory legislation. They are giving us such legislation constantly. What the old anti-slavery heroes wanted was restriction or abolition, not party triumph. You are not satisfied to get prohibition; you want your partisan organization and the triumph of your party.

In the second place, you make your own success impossible by dividing and antagonizing the friends of temperance. It is just as bad generalship in politics as in war to divide and distract your own forces. Your movement creates three distinct camps, while there is only one of the enemy. There are Republican Prohibitionists, Democratic Prohibitionists and Prohibition Prohibitionists. And, gentlemen, of these three divisions of Prohibitionists yours is the smallest, most decidedly. This is easily demonstrated. In Massachusetts the total vote in cities and towns against license was, in 1886, about 102,000. The third party for governor the same year was only 8,251. The vote for prohibition in Michigan last year was 178,000. The vote for the third party candidate for the supreme court was only 18,530. In Texas, the vote for the Prohibition amendment last year was 129,273. The year before the third party vote for governor was 19,186. In Georgia 112 of the 137 counties have adopted prohibition. In the same state the third party presidential candidate got 168 votes, a little more than one for each county. The election returns abound in illustrations like these.

Your Prohibition party does not draw the Prohibition voters, either in the north or the south. And the reason is in the plain sight of everybody. It is because your policy antagonizes them. You run your candidates against their candidates; you do what you can to defeat their candidates and elect the candidates—often rum candidates—of the other party; you harass, worry and annoy them, and tell them, as you did in New Jersey, that they are "accessory to the liquor crime and equally guilty with the man who carries on the traffic," You do all this and rouse their political pasion, and then expect them to break their party ties and kneel as penitent converts at your political shrine. And you are so earnest in this warfare against the Republican party in particular that you seem almost to forget that your sole aim is not to wreck parties, but to establish prohibition. In 1886 you waged a hot campaign in New Jersey. In Morris county the Republicans nominated for the senate a man who had made a record as a Prohibitionist in the assembly. The Democrats nominated a man that was known to be for rum, and you nominated a man. Early in the campaign a letter was sent to every saloonkeeper in Morris county by Gottlieb Kruger, the Newark brewer, telling them that the Republican candidate was a dangerous man, an avowed Prohibitionist, and urging them to do all in their power to defeat him. Did the third party say, here is the man for us, the man whom the saloons fear and propose to cut down? Did they say that? Nothing of the sort. They kept their own man in the field. Nor was this all. In the town of Randolph there were more than a score of third party tickets voted with the name of the third party candidate erased, and that of the Democratic candidate inserted. I immediately challenged the correctness of this statement, but got no denial. On the contrary, I was assured that the same thing was done in other parts of the state. Is it any wonder that such incidents as this should drive some men to the conclusion that the third party is not first, last, and all the time for prohibition?

In the third place, your temperance platform is too narrow for a National party, or even a sectional party. [Applause.] Your "bed is shorter than that a man may stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." If the fearful power of the saloon is to be broken, we must begin at once and with whatever means we can command. If state prohibition is impossible for the present, then local option may be used. If local option is also out of reach, then such restrictive measures as are possible should be applied. I have no sympathy with the sentiment that cares not whether the saloons in a community be few or many. Every saloon is a school of vice and a center of bad influences. The reason which leads us to multiply public schools should lead us to reduce public saloons. [Applause.] But your platform, gentlemen, calls only for state or federal prohibition. You must wait everywhere until the sentiment will support that before you can apply any legal remedy. Your influence as a party is really against all other methods. It is only tolerance at best, not active favor, which the Prohibition party gives to any legal method of fighting the saloon, except state or federal prohibition. And so, gentlemen, you propose to build a great National party on this narrow platform; to leap direct to state prohibition without any intermediate steps! The same sort of wisdom would lead you, if you were half a mile from a ditch you wanted to jump, not to take the trouble to walk the half and then jump, but to jump the half mile and ditch, too with such a leap as the world never saw—and never will see. [Applause.] Political parties are not built up in any such way,

In the fourth place, temperance reform is going on bravely without your help. Your party has fought four presidential campaigns, and you have run full tickets in many of the states for several years. How many congressmen have you elected? Not one. How many governors? Not one. How many members of state legislatures? I find seven credited to you in 1886, one of whom was elected by Democratic votes and two by Republican. You still have seven one each in four states, and three in Kentucky. It is rather mean, I know, to taunt you with questions as to what these seven legislators have done but I think the questions are pertinent. What legislation have they devised and placed on the statue books? Where are the breweries and the distilleries and saloons they have closed? What have you to your credit? You have not passed a single law, nor closed a single brewery or distillery or saloon: and you cannot possibly say that you ever will be able to pass a law or close a saloon. Who passed all the hygiene laws in the State and in Congress? Who passed all the local option laws by which hundreds of counties north and south have been freed from the saloon? Who submitted the amendments in Oregon, Michigan, Tennessee, Texas, Rhode Island? To what political organization is due the magnificent advance in the past few years in temperance legislation? Not to you, gentlemen of the Prohibition party. You, as a party, have had no greater part in all this glorious work than a fly on the spoke of a wheel has in moving the carriage. [Applause.]

Does temperance reform require the Prohibition party? Well, I should say not.

Temperance reform requires legislation. The Prohibition party has no political power and cannot, therefore, provide legislation.

Temperance reform requires legislation now. There is no prospect that the Prohibition party will ever be in a position to furnish it.

Temperance reform suceeeds best on a non-partisan basis. The Prohibiton party insists on a partisan basis.

Temperance reform requires all measures and all weapons to fight the saloon, The Prohibition party discards all these save one.

Temperance reform requires unity. The Prohibition party creates division.

Temperance reform proposes a steady advance all along the line. The Prohibition party requires it to wait while the party begins to prepare to get ready. [Applause.]

No; temperance reform does not require the Prohidition party any more than a wagon going up hill requires a brake. It does not require a distinct National party. The fight must be in the states, and when the states or a majority of them are right, Congress will be right, and will give us all needful legislation. Temperance reform, gentlemen, does not need your party but it needs you. I have not attacked you as individual members, but your party as a party. Temperance reform needs your earnestness, your courage, your enthusiasm. It needs your energies and the energies of your magnificent leader, Gen, Fisk. [Applause.] I do not plead for the Republican party or Democratic party, but for temperance reform—practical, common sense temperance reform. I do not say that the continuance of the Prohibition party is a crime. I say it is worse than a crime—it is a blunder! [Loud applause.]

The Sunday Cyclone.

MT. VERNON, ILL., Feb. 20.—The cyclone that visited this city yesterday afternoon at five o'clock destroyed nearly three hundred residences and places of business and unhoused from twelve to fifteen hundred people.

In the fall of the walls many persons were buried under the debris and thirty-five were killed, while twice as many more were injured, eight or ten so seriously that their recovery is despaired of.

Preceding the destructive wind was a heavy fall of rain for half an hour, which drove all the inhabitants to shelter. This was followed by a slight hail storm, accompanied by lightning, and the furious blow which formed into the funnel-shaped cyclone, struck the northwestern portion of the city, unroofing everything in its patch, taking a diagonal course through the business part of the city unroofing and dismantling the Supreme Court building, near the Louisville & Nashville depot, and skipping along to the Methodist and Baptist churches, caving them into worthless masses. What was left of the Supreme Court building was turned into a morgue.

STORIES OF EYE WITNESSES.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 21.—Conductor Reardon, of the Louisville and Nashville train which was caught in the Mount Vernon cyclone, tells the following story:

"It was all over in a minute. The thing that most impressed me was the destruction of the county court house, a magnificent three-story brick building. The court house stood in a prominent place and could easily be seen almost from the tower to the ground. It looked to me as though the huge pile of brick and mortar had been struck by a gigantic batteriug ram, or, if you please, by a big club in the hands of a power strong enough to knock it down at a single blow. It seemed to collapse all at once, spread out, crushed and buried the buildings surrounding it," Marcus Aarons, a Philadelphia drummer, who was a passenger on the train says:

"It was a terrible calamity. I never witnessed anything so frightful in my life. On reaching the Mount Vernon station it began to thunder and lighting. Presently it began to rain and hail, driving every one to shelter. Just about this time, a portentous black cloud, funnel-shaped was seen over our heads. Some of the people knew in a moment what was coming, and began to cry out words of warning. The cloud burst in a minute after forming. It came with the roar and crash of a mighty battle. Houses of all kinds went down like wheat before the flail. Men, women and children ran hither and thither, screaming and praying in their peril and fright. The county court house was utterly wrecked and a three story mill was blown across the track just behind us. Our train was lying in the track of the cyclone, and it was taken at a flying rate down the track. The engineer could not control the train, and fortunately for us the brakes were not on. Trees were uprooted and the cars lifted cleanly off their wheels. The passage of the cyclone must have occupied at least two minutes. I think that fully half the town was totally wrecked, and, to add to the horror of the wind, many fires broke out among the ruins. From the train we could see the smoke and flames rising from a dozen different houses. Our train did not wait long enough for us to learn the accurate loss of life and property, but the devastation was terrible. A strange thing was that three minutes after the cyclone the sun was shining brightly and serenely on the scene of desolation."

J. W. Wallace, agent of the Southern express at Shelbyville, Tenn., also a passenger, described it thus: "I beheld a fearfully black cloud coming from the Northwest. It was in the shape of a large inverted cone, and it could be plainly seen to be revolving around an imaginary axis, and at the same time to be bouncing up and down through the air with wonderful and frightful speed."

Miraculous Cures.

CHAMBERSBURG, Feb. 20.—Mrs Maria B. Woodworth, the trance evangelist, who has gained such a reputation by the wonderful cures she has performed, has been in this place for the past two weeks and numbers her miracles by the scores. Until last Tuesday evening she held her meetings in the United Brethren Church, but this building, although a large one, would not hold half the crowd, so she changed to the rink which has a seating capacity of 2,500 and it has been crowded every evening since she has been there. The interest in Mrs, Woodworth is not confined to the town alone, but people from miles in the country flock to hear her, and it has been found necessary to charge an admission fee to keep the crowd within limits.

The exercises are opened with a service of song, which is conducted by three young women, who assist the evangelist in her work. After the singing Mrs. Woodworth preaches for about thirty minutes, walking up and down the platform, hugging a large Bible to her bosom and occasionally smacking her hands together and using more or less excited and unique gestures, The moment she sits down the young women vociferously begin to sing, and while this is going on Mrs. Woodworth performs her miracles and cures and goes into trances.

One of the greatest cures she had effected here was upon Ex Sheriff Josiah Flitcher, one of the most prominent men of the county, for a year a helpless paralytic; another is Mrs. John Lochbaum, for as long a time helpless with rheumatism. Mrs. William Myers, believed to have consumption, seems to have been cured.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20th, 1888.—The battle has begun. The first gun was fired by Mr. Blaine when he wrote to Chairman Jones of the Republican National Committee, announcing that his name would not be presented to the Republican Nominating Convention. The gun was loaded with a dynamite shell, which exploded when the letter was published, and although it was a week ago, the reverberation may still be heard and the echoes will be heard for months to come from all sections, The first question asked was, what will be the result of the letter? The answer depended entirely on whom you asked. If opposed to Blaine it would be emphatically insisted that the letter had completely removed Mr. Blaine from the field, but if you asked a Blaine man, he would promptly reply that the letter had insured the nomination of Blaine by acclamation, that his friends did not propose to allow him to have any say whatever in the matter. They are going right ahead to nominate and elect him President, as a small compensation for his accidental defeat in 1884.

So there you are. These two classes represent the opinions of all Republicans. You can take your choice. But it is only fair to say that the proportion of opponents to Blaine compared with his supporters is only about one to ten,

One direct result of the Blaine letter is to show how much really good Presidential material the Republican party contains. There are Allison, Sherman, Sheridan, Cullom, Ingalls, Edmunds, Hawley, Harrison, Gresham, Hiscock, Evarts, Frye, and others yet. Is it not an imposing array of brains and ability? Not a man in the list that would not make a good President. Compare that showing with the Democratic list. They have only two, Cleveland and Hill, both from the same State.

The House has instructed the Committee on Manufactures to report on Mr. Millikins resolution, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate the sugar trust in New York, on Friday next. A lively fight is expected over this matter.

It seems as if the average Democratic Congressman is always ready to vote against any legislation that is likely to improve the moral condition of the country. An instance of this was given by the adverse report made on the bill to prohibit the circulation through the mails of newspapers containing lottery advertisements, by a sub-committee of the House Postoffice Committee, composed of two Democrats and one Republican. The latter voted for a favorable report on the bill.

Having passed the Senate, the Blair Educational bill is now before the House, where its fate is enveloped in much doubt.

The Administration merry-go-round starts out to-morrow on a weeks' hunt for Southern Cleveland delegates to the Democratic Nominating Convention, The pary will consist of the President and Mrs. Cleveland, Secretary and Mrs. Whitney, Col, and Mrs. Lamont. The special train is kindly donated by the railroad, but owing to the absence of the palace car with plate glass sines, which was used on the Western trip last fall, the loungers around the way stations will not see so much of the occupants as did their Western fellow citizens. The enthusiasm which this trip is depended upon to arouse, is expected to carry Cleveland along with a rush until enough delegates are secured to make his nomination certain, an expectation that all good Republicans hope will be realized. It would take away half of the pleasure of defeating the Democrats this year if Cleveland should fail to get the nomination.

Saturday was given up by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia to a hearing on the Platt bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in this District. There was quite a crowd present, mostly ladies, and the hearing of the same old arguments on both sides of the question had grown somewhat monotonous when the slender figure of Dr. Mary Walker arose from a back seat. With silk hat in hand she made her way through the crowd to the front of the table around which the committee sat, and asked for five minutes time. She started out by saying she was opposed to the bill. This created great surprise among the lady prohibitionists present, as many of them remembered that many years ago the doctor had asked Congress to pass a law almost identical with this bill, She said her reason for opposing the bill was that such a law could not be enforced. She said Congress might as well attempt to pass a bill forbidding women wearing hoops, busties, corsets, and trains, or to compel them to dress like Dr. Mary Walker. She concluded her remarks by saying that tobacco was more injurious to the human race than alcohol. The ladies, who do not affiliate with Dr. Mary of late, did not relish the episode.

The Bank.

The establishment of a bank in Oakland is an assured fact. Mr. D. E. Offutt will most likely be president, and Mr. Scott Jones, son of Ex-Senator J. P. Jones, of Terra Alta, W. Va., cashier. Mr. Jones has had several years' experience in the banking business.

Notice to Tax-Payers.

All taxes not paid on or before March 20th, 1888, will, without further notice, be collected according to law. I have authorized the following named persons to collect and receipt for me:

Townshend & Son, Oakland.
J. E. Gnagey, Accident.
Jonas Frazee, Selbysport.
A. L. Gnagey, Grantsville.

JONAS E. GNAGEY,
2 25 4t. Collector.

Notice.

All persons knowing themselves indebted to John Shartzer are hereby notified to call and settle by cash, note or produce, on or before March 1st, 1888, as all open accounts after that day will be put in shape of judgments. This may seem somewhat harsh, but remember an open account will be of no good to me after I go West. Everybody is able to give their note. No produce taken on old accounts after the above date.

Appointed Mine Inspector.

The announcement Monday of the appointment of Hon. R. T. Browning as Inspector of Mines, created some surprise, as his name had never been associated with that appointment. The Senator's many friends in county express their pleasure at his good fortune.

The Cumberland Times of Tuesday, in commenting on the appointment, says:

R. T. Browning, of Garrett county, has been chosen mine inspector for Allegany and Garrett counties. We had hoped that this position might be retained by Allegany, but as it has fallen to our sister county, there is no man, out of Allegany, upon whom the mantle could fall with better grace than Dick Browning. A man of sterling worth, widely known and generally esteemed and trusted, Mr. Browning will make a good inspector. He may not be a practical miner, but he is a most honorable, competent man, in whose hands the rights of miner and operator will be alike respected and preserved inviolate.

A Correction.

MT. LAKE PARK, Feb. 20th, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:—Having recently received a letter of inquiry in regard to a statement in my letter published in the REPUBLICAN on the 24th of December last in which I said that it was my opinion "that no man can make a living in Texas by tilling the soil exclusively," I wish to correct that statement by saying it should have read: Judging from information gathered from old settlers, it is my opinion that no man can make a living, one year with another, on 160 acres of high up land in some Northwestern counties in Texas, by tilling the soil exclusively, for lack of moisture. I will say in connection, as a redeeming feature of Texas, that I saw farmers in some localities on 160 acres of land who raised plenty to do them, and some to spare, dry as the season was; and was told that in favorable seasons wheat yield 30 to 40 bushels per acre, corn 50 to 70 bushels, and oats 75 to 100 bushels per acre.

E. W. KELSO.

Mountain Lake Park.

Miss Jennie Smith returned home on the 11th inst., and remained until the 15th. She gave us valuable assistance at our meeting which closed on the 19th, with good results.

The very startling and sad news reached us on last Wednesday night that Mr. M. E. Howe, who has been residing here for about two years, was instantly killed by a helper on the B. & O. R. R., near Tunnelton, W. Va. His family went to Rowlesburg on the accommodation Thursday morning to where the body had been taken. Mrs. Howe and children have the deepest sympathy of this entire community. We hope she will return here and make this her permanent home.

Mr. Shipley and family are all convalescent.

Mr. Hardy, one of our residents, is not so well again.

Mr. Joseph King, an old and well known resident of this community, was thrown from his horse yesterday and had one of his legs broken between the knee and foot. We hope his sufferings may not be great.

Miss Ella Dawson, of Rowlesburg, is to open a private school here on next Monday.

We have been having very fine weather here for some time. The old snow has nearly all disappeared.

J. A. E.

Grantsville.

Some of the farmers are making sugar while others are waiting for a warm spell of weather.

John Foy was seriously hurt by the falling of slate in the coal mine of Samuel Baker.

The family of Mr. Pat. Dorsey have the scarlet fever.

Another wedding on hand, and the young couple don't care who knows it, either.

Ross Compton warns all lovers of chickens to stay away from his coop.

If we get all the promised new buildings this summer our town will experience quite a change.

Noah Broadwater made a trip to Cumberland this week.

A cheese factory in the Forks, we are told, is a settled fact, if the milk can be obtained.

John Mellinger will put up his saw mill at Jockey Hollow in a few days.

Notice.

All persons indebted to the estate of Peter Reitz, deceased, either by note or account, are hereby notified to settle up by the 1st day of April, 1888, All claims not settled by that time will be placed in the hands of an officer for collection.

GEORGE W. REITZ,
2 25 4t Administrator.

The Woolen Factory in New Hands.

Last Saturday the Oakland woolen factory passed into the hands of Messrs. Julius C. and Arnold Scherr, of Grant county, W. Va. The mill will be put in repair at once, and be in full operation by the first of May. This will afford our wool growers a cash market for their wool, and will give employment to from fifteen to twenty persons. The Messrs. Scherr are energetic business men, with ample means for carrying on the business successfully. We wish them success.

The Coyention at Wheeling.

The passenger department of the B. & O. R. R. announce that arrangements have been made to sell Excursion tickets to Wheeling and return at single fare for the round trip, from all stations on its lines between Harpers Ferry and Parkersburg, Grafton and Benwood, and Morgantown and Fairmont, on account of the Immigration Convention to be held at Wheeling on the 29th inst.

The tickets will be sold for all trains, February 28th and 29th, and valid for return passage until March 2nd, 1888.

S. L. Townshend & Son

Are now located in their new store room, on Alder street, opposite Sturgiss' drug store, where they are enabled to wait upon the public, to whom they will sell as low as the lowest, the same quality of goods. Will take all kinds of produce they can handle, at the market price, in exchange for goods. They keep a full line of the celebrated Milwaukee Oil Grain Shoes, for men, women and children; also the Crusader Boots and Shoes.

The B. & O. Relief Association.

The report of the Baltimore and Ohio Employees' Relief Association for the month of December shows that there were eleven accidental deaths, in which cases the benefits amounted to $10,000; fourteen cases of natural death, with benefits aggregating $9,731; accidental injuries 348, benefits $5,339; natural sickness, 477, benefits $7,661.94, making aggregate payments of $34,718.52, including bills for physicians. From May 1, 1880, to December 31, 1987, the association has paid in benefits to members for deaths, injuries and sickness, $1,597, 886.61.

Sheridan Won't Have It.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19. — The Washington agent of the Associated Press sought an interview with Gen. Sheridan this evening for the purpose of ascertaining whether he would consent to make an authoritative statement in regard to his alleged Presidential candidacy. The General gave his consent, and it will be seen from the following verbatim report of the conversation that his declarations are thoroughly explicit:

Agent. "Of course, General, you have noticed that there has been considerable mention of you during the past few weeks as a possible or probable candidate for the Presidency next autumn?"

Gen. Sheridan. "Yes, I have noticed it, but have never looked upon these newspaper articles as anything more than the usual shooting around in the woods which has once or twice before, in Presidential years, brought my name up in that connection."

Agent. "But, General, the talk is more serious this time, and there appears to be something like a concentrated movement to bring about your nomination."

General Sheridan. "Well, I know nothing more about this alleged 'boom' than what I have read in the papers, except that now and then some friend has twitted me about becoming a candidate. But, if the matter is really now discussed seriously, it is time that all parties concerned should be informed that they are wasting their breath. I have never had the presidential bee in my bonnet, and I don't intend to have it, for there is nothing that would induce me to leave the profession in which nearly forty years of my life has been spent to enter upon a civil career. So all talk about my being a candidate may as well end."

Agent. "But, suppose the Republican Convention should—"

Gen. Sheridan. "Nominate me? I would not accept. But there is not the slightest probability of my being nominated; and, in any event, I would not accept. No! Not under any circumstances! I do not want that or any other civil office."

Boys Who Became Famous Men.

About sixty years ago a certain Mr. Doty, a silversmith of Albany, had an apprentice who appeared to be a very bright fellow of seventeen years. He read books with avidity, but none with more pleasure and eagerness than Shakespeare and the works of other dramatic writers. He seemed to have an especial passion for such, indeed, coupled with an inclination for the stage. The time came soon for the indulgence of this taste; he joined a company of young amateur actors who played at a little theatre called Thespian. The young apprentice's talent for dramatic impersonation became the talk of the town before long; and when Mr. Bernard, a noted manager in those days, came to Albany with his own strong company of professional actors he was impelled to visit the Thespian theatre to see the young amateur of whom he had heard so favorably. The play that night was "Hamlet;" and the manager was struck so with the young man's ability and intelligence that he sent for him and made him a very tempting offer to join his own company and adopt the stage as a profession.

Just before this the young man had received an offer of a gratuitous education from Dr. Beck, president of the Albany academy; and the night the manager spoke to him he sought his two "chums." One of these two was master Thurlow Weed, then a journeyman printer. Both advised him strongly to accept Dr. Beck's offer. But the young appaentice was still in doubt. His inclination prompted him to go on the stage, while his judgment dictated the acceptance of Dr. Beck's kind offer. He left at last saying that he would talk with his employer about it. Silversmith Doty liked the lad, and believed that he had a career of usefulness before him in some learned profession; so when the lad told him of the two ofers he had received, he said kindly but firmly:

"Joseph, you are under identures to me for two years yet. If you will accept the ofer of a free education I will let you go freely. But if you conclude to go on the stage, you must make good to me the loss of these two years' service."

This determined the lad; and he went to Dr. Beck's, studied faithfully and graduated with honors, and became one of the first scholars of his day.

"Of course," added the narrator of this story, the venerable Thurlow Weed, "you are curious to know who he was; I will tell you. The lad was Dr. Joseph Henry, late president of Smithsonian Institute."—Presbyterian.

A True Gentleman.

When you have in truth found a man, you have not far to go to find a gentleman. You cannot make a gold ring out of brass. You cannot change a Cape May crystal to a diamond. You cannot make a gentleman till you first find a man.

To be a gentleman, it is not sufficient to have had a grandfather. To be a gentleman does not depend on the tailor or the toilet. Blood will degenerate. Good clothes are not good habits. The Prince Leo Boo concluded that the hog was the only gentleman in England, as being the only thing that did not labor.

A gentleman is just a gentleman; no more, no less—a diamond polished that was first a diamond in the rough. A gentleman is gentle. A gentleman is courteous. A gentleman is slow to take offense, as being one who never gives it. A gentleman is slow to surmise evil, as being one who never thinks it. A gentleman subjects his appetites. A gentleman subdues his feelings. A gentleman controls his speech. A gentleman deems every other better than himself. Sir Philip Sydney was never so much of a gentleman—mirror though he was of English knighthood—as when, upon the field of Zutphen, as he lay in his own blood, he waived the draught of cold spring water that was to quench his mortal thirst, in favor of a dying soldier.

St. Paul describes a gentleman when he exhorted the Philippian Christian: "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." And Dr. Isaac Barrow, in his admirable sermon on the callings of a gentleman, pointedly says: "He should labor and study to be a leader unto virtue, and a noble promoter thereof; directing exciting men thereto by his exemplary conversation; encouraging them by his countenance and authority; rewarding the goodness of meaner people by his bounty and favor. He should be such a gentleman as Noah, who preached righteousness by his words and works before a profane world." — Bishop Doane.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated · Press · News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. ● Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

THE Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright: It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay. ●

UNREST.

The farther you journey and wander
From the sweet simple faith of your youth,
The more you peer into the Yonder
And search for the root of all truth,
No matter what secrets uncover
Their veiled mystic brows in your quest,
Or close on your astral sight hover,
Still, still shall you walk with unrest.

If you seek for strange things you shall find them,
But the finding shall bring you to grief;
The dead lock the portals behind them,
And he who breaks through is a thief.
The soul with such ill-gotten plunder,
With its premature knowledge oppressed,
Shall grope in unsatisfied wonder
Alway by the shores of unrest.

Though bold hands lift up the thin curtain
That hides the unknown from our sight;
Though a shadowy faith becomes certain
Of the new life that follows death's night;
Though miracles past comprehending
Shall startle the heart in your breast,
Still, still will your thirst be unending,
And your soul will be sad with unrest.

There are truths too sublime and too holy
To grasp with a mortal mind's touch,
We are happier far to be lowly:
Content means not knowing too much.
Peace dwells not with hearts that are yearning
To fathom all labyrinths unguessed,
And the soul that is bent on vast learning
Shall find with its knowledge—unrest.

BRAVING A STORM.

The True Story of a School-Teacher's Heroism.

The 31st of December, 186— is remembered by many persons as the date of the beginning of one of the wildest and most fatally destructive winter storms that ever swept across the wide, unprotected prairies of the West. The inhabitants of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, and of the West generally, suffered severely.

In Middle Illinois the storm broke with almost the suddenness of a tornado, resulting not only in great destruction of domestic animals, but in the loss of many human lives. The season until then had been uncommonly mild, and even on this last day of the year the roads were deep with mud.

The morning dawned with a deceitful brightness; a gentle, spring-like breeze came from the south, the sky w[as] cloudless, and the old-fashioned [rail] fence cast a distinct zigzag shad[ow] along the south side of the road. [Miss] Mary Rast, a girlish school-teacher, [and] several of her small pupils, all in h[igh] glee over the approaching New Yea[r's] holiday, picked their way carefully [to] ward the school-house. This buildi[ng] stood out by itself on the prairie, a[nd] the only dwelling within half a m[ile] was that of Mr. Kent, in whose fam[ily] Miss Rast boarded.

The attendance on that day was [not] usually small: only twelve scholars [re]ported themselves; and these w[ere] mostly from the nearest families; [for] the older settlers, accustomed to [the] capricious weather of the West, h[ad] viewed the brightness of the morn[ing] with suspicion, and kept their child[ren] at home. By noon a slight haze ov[er]cast the sun, but the air was still qu[iet] and mild. Three boys, who lived ab[out] a mile distant, and a cousin stay[ing] with them, ran home across the fie[lds] to dinner, and, somewhat to the teach[er's] surprise, did not return.

She was thus left with a flock of eight. Four of these were children of Mr. Kent; two of the others lived a mile and a half away, while the remaining two, Willie and Mary Wood, who were only ten and eight years old, respectively, came from a house fully three-quarters of a mile west of the school-house.

At about two o'clock the day suddenly began to darken, and there came a few short, but fierce puffs of wind from the southwest. The young teacher looked out anxiously, wondering at the change, and saying to herself that she must hold a short session and send the children home in good season. For half an hour all was quiet again, but a thick, murky gloom came creeping over the landscape, and a few flakes of snow fell slowly and silently, melting as fast as they touched the muddy ground.

An older and more experienced person would have known what to expect from such signs, and would have fled with the scholars to the nearest place of safety; but Miss Rast, as we have said, was only a girl, and, moreover, had never wintered in the West before, so that she knew little about the fierceness of a winter storm on the prairie.

Again the wind blew in angry gusts, this time longer, louder and more directly from the west, and again followed a short interval of strange silence. The temperature fell with great rapidity, until, in a few minutes, the air was freezing cold; then all at once, with a wild, thunderous roar, the storm burst. From west to north stretched a black, heaving sea of cloud, tossed and torn by the wind, that now shrieked and screamed like a storm demon. In trembling haste the teacher set about preparing the children for their terrible journey. There was no staying at the school-house, with neither food nor fuel for the long, bitter night, and she determined to take the whole company to her own boarding-place, knowing how welcome they would be—if only they could get there.

By this time the frightened children were clinging about her, and little Mary Wood began crying to go home. Poor little thing! she could not bear to be separated from her mother, even over night. Willie sturdily declared that they could get home well enough, but the teacher would not consent to their making the attempt. By going east with her they would have the wind nearly at their backs, and it was clear enough that no child could live in the face of such a storm.

Of the eight scholars, the oldest was little more than twelve, while Robbie Kent, a delicate boy, was younger even than Mary Wood. This smallest and weakest of the flock Miss Rast made her especial care, and, taking him by the hand, she made the rest grasp each other firmly, bidding them keep together, and close to her. Then, at last, she opened the door that had stood, a frail barrier, between them and the storm. The first gust took them off their feet; but the little teacher summoned strength and courage, and, with a silent prayer for help, gathered them up, hushed their outcries, and, putting the smaller children between the larger, and making them take hold of her cloak, her dress, her hands—somehow they must keep together—started them again on their well-nigh impossible journey.

It was like trying to walk through deep-drifted snow, so thick was the air, while the the wind raged and howled, twisting and flinging them from side to side.

"Keep—together—children!" panted the little teacher, as she huddled them up for a few moments to take breath.

There was no crying now; only a weak, quavering wail from Robbie, that caused the teacher to catch him up in her arms, and clasp him close, with a sinking heart, lest he should be smothered by the blinding snow, fine as flour but sharp as needle points. And so, panting and struggling, now stopping to count if all were there, and now pushing on again, they fought their fearful way, step by step.

"Keep—together—children!" was all the breathless teacher tried to say; and still the storm increased in fury; every moment the sky grew blacker and thicker, and night was fast settling down on the poor, struggling band.

Their puny strength was all but exhausted. Every crevice of their clothing was filled with snow, their eyelids were covered with frost, tears were frozen on cold little cheeks, tiny hands grew too stiff to hold on to each other; and still the teacher counted her flock, and hoped and prayed that somehow she might yet save them all.

But in such a tempest human strength and ingenuity are of small avail; and when, at last, gasping, numb and near-never be resurrected. That was [more] than twenty-five years ago. Wh[at] is that party to-day—lost in the [his]tory of the fast-moldering p[ast]. Nay; but in the full vigor of life [and] power, holding the reins of the [na]tional government. If slavery [and] treason and rebellion will not k[ill] party, what have you, gentlem[en] that is more effectual? [Applau]se.

But you say the Republican p[arty] is doomed, also. The grand old p[arty] must go. It has done glorious thi[ngs]. its record is without taint of trea[son]. it saved the country; it broke forem[ost] the bonds of the slave; it restor[ed] the Union; it brought back pe[ace] and prosperity to our distracted [na]tion; it is the party of Lincoln a[nd] Summer and Grant and Garfie[ld]. [Applause.] Do you think that [the] wickedness could not kill the Dem[o]cratic, virtue will make the Repu[b]lican party to be immortal? [Laughter.]

protecting their faces from the storm as best she could, in order that they might rest, and recover their spent breath; she gently rubbed and talked to Robbie, until he revived a little; then getting them all in front of her, the smallest in the center, she made them start again.

But the stupefied children now began to whimper, begging to lie down; and she had almost to force them on, step by step, pushing one, pulling another, gathering them up when they fell, and keeping them all the time in a bunch, lest others should drop out, as Mary and Willie had done.

So she fought and struggled till the hands with which she tried to grasp the children were too deadened to feel any thing, and bitter despair filled her heart.

Then, all at once, some one, groping through the snow and battling with the wind, brushed against them, and she heard a shout, as if it were muffled and far away. In another moment, Robbie was in his father's arms, while the little teacher, completely overcome, sobbed aloud for relief and joy.

Mr. Kent had taken with him his grown-up son and a hired man, and, to prevent separation, had adopted a device of mountain climbers and fastened them all together by a long line passed round the body of each.

Miss Rast, in eager haste, reported the loss of Mary and Willie, and begged the men to endeavor to find them; but Mr. Kent pronounced the attempt out of the question, especially as the remaining children were fast freezing to death. They must not sacrifice seven lives in a fruitless effort to save two.

The three rescuers now surrounded the worn-out group, and the rope proved to be of the greatest service, keeping them as in a small pen. Even the teacher was glad to cling to it for support. The men hurried the children onward, carrying them at times, and then driving them like bewildered sheep; till, finally the friendly doorway was reached, where a mother's longing heart and eager arms gathered them in with thankfulness too deep for words.

Fingers, faces and feet were found to be badly frozen; but willing hands worked rapidly, stripping and rubbing, thawing the frosted parts with snow and cold water, and soon the weary little sufferers fell into a heavy sleep.

Miss Rast's own hands were injured so badly that it was weeks before she could use them; but her thoughts were all of the two lost children. All that night, exhausted as she was, she scarcely slept. O, if she had but watched them more closely! So she reproached herself, while to every one else it seemed little less than a miracle that she had been able to save so many of her charges.

It was nearly three days before the wind died away, so that word could be taken to poor, widowed Mrs. Wood. She had feared the worst, yet the news came with crushing force; for however much we may expect death, we are never prepared for its actual presence. For weeks she found herself often looking out of the window, half expecting to see Mary and Willie coming home again after school.

The whole neighborhood turned out, as soon as the storm was over, and worked day after day, shoveling over the snow. But all proved in vain, and it was not till spring that the little bodies were found, buried under one of the largest drifts, several rods from the road. Evidently the children had lost their hold on the others while crossing the little brook, and the wind had carried them down the bed of the run and lodged them against a steep bank in the field, where the snow soon packed its cold and pitiless weight upon them.

Poor little brother and sister! Their hands were still tightly clasped. With all their childish strength they had striven to obey their teacher and "keep together;" and together they had gone home, on the wings of the wild, wintry tempest.—Mrs. L. J. Strong, in Youth's Companion.

A FUNNY EPSODE.

An Esquiman Medicine Man's Astonishment and Fright.

There was another episode which these peculiar people seemed to consider as a huge joke, which I will explain as briefly as possible, to show what the native people consider as funny in the frigid zones. One of the Esquiman men had a peculiarly disfigured face, to which he pointed so often that one of the party was finally led to ask him the cause. He most cheerfully assented to explain, amidst the grins and suppressed laughter of the others. When he was a young boy he was one of a small band of natives that came upon the remains of one of Sir John Franklin's unfortunate parties, that had starved to death, and they found many curious things among the scattered material at the site of the sad scene. One, which immediately took his boyish eye, was a flattened can that he found, full of "black sand," as he expressed it. The "black sand" was of no possible use to him, and, on the first occasion he had to utilize the can, which was one winter evening, when he was sitting by the lamp in his snow-house, he poured this useless material out on the platform of snow that held the lamp, and in doing so some of it splashed in the flame. There was an instantaneous explosion, which he tried to explain by yelling "boom," until I thought the top of my head had been knocked off, and when some of the shock had passed away he found that the top of his snow-hut had disappeared in the dark night, the stone lamp was broken into pieces, and the kitchen utensils and parlor furniture all mixed up. He was a medicine man of the tribe—that is, one supposed to cure sickness by magic, incantations, etc.—and at the time the powder-can exploded a patient was visiting him, who disappeared in the confusion, and his whereabouts was not known for a month or two afterward, when he turned up in another tribe farther south, whose doctors, he claimed, were not of such a pyrotechnic school of medicine. The medicine man said that his own nervous system was badly shattered for a long time, and his hands and face were fearfully scarred as evidence of his story, but if his appetite was at all injured he had more than fully recovered, for he was the most enormous eater, savage or civilized, that I ever saw in my life, and could easily dispose of a reindeer ham at a lunch, whenever he came around to repeat his story, which was altogether too frequent; but we luckily found a good plan of ridding ourselves of him by the apparent careless handling of a powder-can.—Lieut. Schwatka, in Woman.

MOST UNFORTUNATE.

How an Unlucky Fellow Was Pursued by the Demons of Adversity.

I am the most unfortunate fellow in the world," said a man whose persistent bad luck had given him a sort of reputation.

"What is your latest stroke of misfortune?" some one asked.

"Why, last summer I rented the second story of a house in a very cheerful part of town, and after signing a lease, had begun to congratulate myself, when some fellow started a Turkish bath on the ground floor, with the sweat-box immediately under my sitting-room. Well, sir, I actually thought we would melt, but we stood it, encouraged by the fact that when winter should come we would be put to no expense for coal. I did not think that we could live through August, but we pulled through after losing more flesh than could be well spared. When the newspapers began their annual howl against the coal dealers, my wife and I laughed. We were out of the clutches of the dealer. The thermometer might cut its zero capers, but our room would be warm. Alas!"

"Any thing go wrong?"

"Well, yes. About the time the mercury fell to zero the infernal fellow down stairs moved his bath away, and as the money which would have been our coal allowance had been spent, we were left to freeze. Yes, I am the most unfortunate fellow in the world."—Arkansaw Traveler.

TEMPERANCE.

TOO LATE FOR THEM.

A Father's Broken Promises and the Anguish and Remorse That Followed.

It was a place where poverty had long made its home. By the fireless stove sat a man of rather powerful physique in a dejected attitude, his heavy, bleared eyes fixed upon vacancy. In one corner of the room, upon a mean bed, a little child lay, with pallid, want-pinched features, moaning, with closed eyes, at intervals.

"Water, water!" she cried, faintly, and listlessly arose the man and placed a cup to her fever-parched lips.

Her large eyes opened and fixed themselves upon his face.

"Father," she said, as a shudder shook her frame, "father!"

"Yes," said the man, stolidly. "Your mother's gone out to her work. Do you want any thing?"

"Want any thing!" exclaimed the child, faintly gazing about the nearly empty room; "want any thing?"

He caught her glance and a spasm of pain contracted his features.

"Want," she again moaned, turning her head wearily upon the pillow; "it's always been want for mother and me, ever since I can remember."

The man's fingers worked convulsively as he replied:

"And for your poor old father, too, Lena. Don't forget your father, who loves you so."

A smile broke over her face.

"Love me?" and her little hand timidly sought his "Oh, father."

"Forgive me, Lena," he cried, "forgive me. I were drunk when I struck ye down, and didn't know what I were doin'."

"Drunk," she said, simply. "Yes."

He bowed his head, while the tears trickled down his intemperate face. She tried to lift her face to his, but a groan of agony broke from her lips.

"Ye are sufferin', Lena?"

"My head, oh, my head," she moaned, stirring it uneasily and disclosing a much-discolored temple. "It bleeds inside, father, I think, but never mind," she added, marking his shame, "never mind. You never struck me so hard before, I'll get well, though, and you know I—I saved mother, poor mother."

Her eyes closed, and seemingly she slept. The man resumed his place beside the stove. His chin drooped upon his breast, and silence—only disturbed at intervals by a faint moan from the child—filled the room.

The afternoon waned, and the chill of a November twilight presently shook the man's frame. Night had fallen when the door opened and a fragile, toil-worn woman entered the room. It was the wife and mother. The child stirred and smiled into the eyes of the compassionate ones above her. "Mother," she murmured, "dear mother."

"Did ye get your money," eagerly inquired the man.

"Only part of it," said the weary woman. "Mrs. Brown always leaves something over, yet she has plenty of money. There are some cold scraps, if you want them."

"I'm not hungry," said the shivering man, "but I want to get Lena an orange or two. She's been asking for 'em," he added, in a low voice, turning his face from her sad eyes.

"I'm so tired," answered the wife, "and—and—I can't trust you, John, to go. You'll not come back."

"Yes, I will, oh, yes, I will," he replied, eagerly; "and bring wood for a fire. I'll hev to watch by Lena while you sleep to-night, and it's very cold. I'm a changed man, wife—a changed man. No more want, no more drink, no more blows. I'll be a man!"

A look of hope filled her eyes. She had caught at the straws of his promises, oh, how many times, how many times! but his tone this night was so convincing, the sob in his throat, the tear in his eye so unwonted, that despite the past with its broken promises and failures, a new hope, sweet and strange, thrilled her being. She gave him the few bits of silver. He stooped over the child, as he turned to leave the room, and pressed his lips to hers.

"Dear father," said the delighted child, "it's so long since you kissed me. Wake me up that way in the morning, and if I groan through the night, don't think of the blow, but kiss me, and I'll smile through the pain, perhaps."

His eyes were dry now, and so was his throat, no sob, no tear.

"Where's father?" cried the child, as the minutes sped on.

"Gone to get you the oranges you wished, dear," was the answer.

"Oranges," cried the child. "O, how nice, but, mother, I didn't ask for oranges. We are too poor for that, little mother, too poor."

The wife's heart sank.

"A lie," she muttered, "a lie built upon the sufferings of his child. Alas! he will not come back!

Hours passed. Colder and colder grew the room. Shivering, the mother lay beside the child, the scanty covering over both.

"I am ill, I fear," she murmured, "and there's such a pain at my heart."

Ever and anon the child groaned. The clock from an adjoining steeple struck one.

"Has father come?" cried the little one, opening her eyes.

"No! he will be here presently, though," wearily answered the mother.

The clock struck three.

"Has father come," more faintly now the question.

"No, my child, no."

The white dawn of morning crept into the room. The mother slept; the little one ceased to groan. The sun lifts his head, and rosy-red blushes the dawn. Smilingly the god of day arises and peeps into the attic window, creeps over the floor, and shyly kisses the face of the sleeping mother and child. Eight o'clock rings out from the steeple.

"Father," suddenly cries the child, unclosing her heavy eyes, "come, kiss me good-morning."

The mother made no response. Lena's eyes closed again. Nine from the steeple clock. Hark! a heavy foot-fall upon the stairs, a fumbling at the latch. Father has come home.

"In bed yet," he mutters, angrily. "Here, get up," shaking the sleeping woman's shoulder; "get up and make a fire, I'm cold."

His wife stirred not. Waveringly he makes his way to the chair beside the empty stove, droops his head upon his breast, then sinks into a drunken slumber. Noon passes. No movement breaks the silence. Twilight again ere the man raises his head. Dazedly, at first, he gazes about him, then recollection sits enthroned.

"Lena," he cries, stooping over the quiet little figure. "Lena, father was too late to kiss you good-morning, but he will to-morrow, indeed he will. Your father is going to be a man."

Cold and rigid were the lips he touched with his.

"Dead!" he cried, starting back, "dead! Wife, wife, wake up; see, our Lena is dead."

The wife made no movement, and in terror he turned her face to his, that face whose lips were forever dumb, whose ears were forever closed to his frail promises; eyes, to which his vain words had brought the last gleam of hope, closed in an eternal sleep.

His dead for years filled a pauper's grave, then one day a prosperous man stood beside a new mound in a beautiful cemetery. Upon the headstone was the simple inscription: "Hope Grey"—"Our Lena."

A kneeling figure, chisel in hand, was adding a few words—"Too late."

"Yes," said the man, in anguished tones, falling upon his knees, when the work was done, "for them it was too late."—Mrs. Nora Marble, in N. Y. Observer.

A Mother's Influence.

In a railway car a man about sixty years old came to sit beside me. He had heard me lecture the evening before on Temperance. "I am master of a ship," said he, "sailing out of New York, and have just returned from my fifteenth voyage across the Atlantic. About thirty years ago I was a sot, shipped while dead drunk, and was carried on board like a log. When I came to, the captain asked me: 'Do you remember your mother?' I told him she died before I could remember. 'Well,' said he, 'I am a Vermont man. When I was young I was crazy to go to sea. At last my mother consented I should seek my fortune. 'My boy,' she said, 'I don't know any thing about towns, and I never saw the sea, but they tell me they make thousands of drunkards. Now, promise me you'll never drink a drop of liquor.' He said: 'I laid my hands in hers and promised, as I looked into her eyes for the last time. She died soon after. I've been on every sea, seen the worst kinds of life and men; they laughed at me as a milksop and wanted to know if I was a coward. But when they offered me liquor, I saw my mother's pleading face, and I never drank a drop. It has been my sheet-anchor; I owe it all to that. Would you like to take that pledge?' said he. My companions took it," and, he added, "it has saved me. I have a fine ship, wife and children at home, and I have helped others."

That earnest mother saved two men to virtue and usefulness; how many more, He who sees all can alone tell.—Wendell Phillips.

A Dog Demoralized by the Saloon Influence.

The Washington Post mentions a saloon-proprietor of that city who "has a big mastiff dog which has proved the relation of the brute to man by taking up one of the vices which heretofore has been deemed a manly prerogative." This dog, it appears, "is an inveterate toper;" will take a drink every time invited, "and has a capacity for beer that is really surprising." When any one enters the saloon and calls for drinks the dog, generally lying asleep on the floor, will get up, walk slowly to the bar, put "paws upon the counter, and wink at the bar-keeper," and, given beer, "drinks it with relish." It will also go to other saloons in the vicinity, and push its way in and repeat the same performance. Alas! for saloon influence that should thus demoralize even a dog!—National Temperance Advocate.

At the Boston election dastardly outrages were committed by the liquor men upon the women who held "No" ballots. Miss Dodge, of Cambridge, was distributing "No" ballots in precinct 1 of ward 20, when some one came behind her and poured vitriol down her back. Turning to see who it was, she received some of it on her hands. The fluid left scars which will remain for life. A police officer, to whom she called for aid, refused to arrest the scoundrel.—Voice.

A LAW has been passed and is vigorously enforced in Copenhagen, by which every man leaving a wine-shop drunk is conducted back to the tavern in a vehicle at the expense of the wine merchant who allowed him to get drunk on his premises.

OUR CALIFORNIA LETTER.

SACRAMENTO CITY, January 21, 1888.
[Special Correspondence.]

California, the largest State in the Union except Texas, is 700 miles long with an average width of 250 miles. The Sierra Nevada and Coast Range of mountains run parallel, northeast and southwest, the Sierras having an altitude of from 8,000 to 14,000 feet; the Coast Range from 2,500 to 4,000 feet, and they are divided by a number of valleys and rivers, the principal one being the Sacramento valley, 200 miles in length and 45 miles average width, through which runs the Sacramento river, a navigable stream for about 150 miles from its entrance into Suisun bay, a small bay at the head of the bay of San Francisco.

Sacramento valley proper includes the counties of Sacramento, Yuba, Butte, Tehama, Colusa, Sutter, Yolo and Solane, these being bordered by the mountain counties of Amador, El Dorado, Placer, Nevada Sierra, Plumas, Shasta, Trinity, Mendocino, Lake and Napa, affording a great variety of soil and climate, owing to the difference in elevation.

The soil of the valley counties bordering upon the Sacramento river is principally a dark, rich adobe and alluvial soil, and well adapted to the growth of cereals. Along the foot hills varieties of soil from black adobe to light sandy soil appears. The lower slopes of the mountains contain different soil, some being sands, of light color, others light clay, and much a deep red clay. The summits are more rocky and volcanic, and the soils vary, some being clay hills, sandy ridges, loamy meadows and deep, rich valleys in the very tops of the mountains, being the favorite resort of large herds of sheep and cattle during the summer months.

Stretching along the foot-hills and up the mountain sides to the altitude of 2,500 feet is what is known as the "thermal belt." It is in this belt where the warm air lingers when the sun goes down, and to which the warm air rises when the first rays of the morning sun are thrown upon the valley. Tender plants and semi-tropical fruits are grown in profusion, as was fully demonstrated at the Citrus fair held in Oroville, Butte County, in December last. This "thermal belt" is also noted for its wonderful curative qualities in lung and asthmatic complaints. But very little good Government or railroad land near the railroads or rivers remain. Land is worth from $5 to $500 per acre according to location and improvements. In the foot-hill region land is selling from $5 to $50 per acre. In the valley bordering on the Sacramento river large ranches of from 1,000 to 60,000 acres have been the prevailing feature. As population comes in, these will be subdivided and on their rich alluvial soil thousands of small farms, the homes of thrifty families, will be established, but this can not be accomplished until the population increases and there is a demand. The population of this great State is about 1,500,000, but it is capable of supporting 10,000,000 people.

All this vast region of soil, water and climate, unsurpassed by any other, now invites population—not lazy, shiftless, impecunious persons, such would soon starve or be found begging—but men with brain and muscle, and enough money to give them a fair start, enough to sustain them while improving the lands, to make them produce that for which nature intended them—such men, if with families so much the better, can find abundant opportunities to secure at moderate cost such a home as will be pleasant and profitable. A man with a family willing to help him, if he has from $1,000 to $3,000 in hand, is safe to make a beginning which, if he is judicious, should lead him to prosperity.

There are mineral springs in the foot-hill ranges upon both sides of the Sacramento valley that vie in their curative qualities with the far-famed springs of Germany, and are resorted to by invalids from every section of the United States.

Two branches of the Central Pacific railroad leaves Sacramento—one on the east side of the valley, via Marysville and Chico and the intermediate towns, the other on the west side, via Woodland Willows and Williams and intermediate towns uniting at Tehama, the now head of navigation on Sacramento river. From thence the road is continued to Portland, Ore., this road having been completed within the last sixty days, opening up country wonderfully rich in farming timber and mineral products.

Until the past five years, the raising of wheat and barley was the principal occupation of the farmers of the Sacramento valley, the grain being transported to Europe on ships, but the completion of three trans-continental railroads—the Central Pacific, Southern Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, with the prospect of other roads soon coming, affording increased facilities and reduced rates of transportation, has given a wonderful impetus toward raising fruit, and California will soon be considered the garden spot of the world. The Sacramento valley has supplied nine-tenths of the fruit sent East, and the "Fruit Growers' Union," an association of farmers, in the year 1887 sold their fruit in New York and Boston on the auction plan, and with gratifying success. It will be tried in other cities this coming season, with reduced rates of transportation, so that sixty million of people in the United States can afford to purchase these California fruits, and the progress and development of the fruit business will be something wonderful.

The largest grain-growers in the valleys do their plowing with gang plows and their harvesting with the latest improved machinery. Consequently farm hands in the past had employment only during a portion of the year, but since the fruit and vine business is coming to the front, more and continuous labor is required, and in some of the more advanced fruit districts during the fruit picking season the school vacations are extended in order to allow the children to assist in securing the crops.

Fruit canneries and driers are being established and thousands of tons of fruit are preserved in this manner. Good farm hands get from $25 to $30 per month by the year; harvest hands, $1.50 to $2.50 per day; mechanics, from $2 to $4 per day; good house servants, from $15 to $30 per month, and are scarce. Chinese are largely employed in house service, but could be easily displaced by bright American or German girls who would be willing to go into the country. The Celtic girls, as a rule, dislike to leave the cities.

Railroads now traverse the principal valleys, the rate of fare being three cents per mile on valley and four cents per mile on mountain routes.

Dry-goods, clothing, and, in fact, all the lighter class of goods can be purchased as cheaply as in the Western States. Heavy goods, where freight is an important item of cost, are more expensive.

Banks, both commercial and savings, are plenty, the current rate of interest at this time being seven to nine per cent. per annum. Hotel accommodation both good and reasonable, fair board being obtained at twenty-five cents per meal and four dollars per week. First-class hotels charge from two to four dollars per day for room and board.

There are plenty of good newspapers, churches and schools. The writer, in his wanderings over the mountains and through the valleys of the central portion of this wonderful State, could not help noticing the cosmopolitan character, free and easy, hospitable, kind-hearted character of the people.

—In the Chinese language, coutsil, spoken with a rising inflection, means trousers; with a falling inflection, fruit. One day a new missionary gave a dinner to some of her foreign friends, and, among other things, ordered her native servant to have coutsil for dessert. The dinner proper passed off pleasantly, but what was the lady's horror at the close of the meal to see her servant enter the dining-room bearing on a large waiter three pairs of her husband's trousers.

JAPANESE MOXA CURE.

How Patients are Treated with Burning Cones of Sticky Dough.

While we lunched in the open quadrangle before the temple groups of cheery Japanese came in, chattering as gayly as any picnickner could wish to, took off their straw sandals, washed their feet, and disappeared in jolly parties to the interior of the temple. When we dropped our shoes and followed to the one upper room, we found our jolly chatterers all there, sitting in rows with their faces to the walls. All were stripped to the waist, and the old priest made marks on their backs in sacred characters to indicate where the moxa should be burned. Following him came a small boy with a lump of what appeared to be very sticky dough in one hand. With dexterous fingers this youngster pinched off a piece of dough, rolled it into a small cone, and stuck it over the priest's mark. After him came a staid, stoical youngster, who in the most cold-blooded way touched a match to the tip of the moxa cone and went down the lines giving lights. It burned without flame, a slow red glow like charcoal, consuming the cone down to the flesh, where it sizzled and smoked for a few seconds, that must have seemed years to the victims. Searing with a red-hot iron would be quick and humane treatment compared to this slow-eating fire of the moxa. The men and women that I watched for the few minutes that I could endure it, stood it heroically, but by the tension of every muscle in their backs and arms one could judge of their agony. One old man folded his arms, bent his head over and indulged in suppressed chuckles that varied with groans and hysterical ha! ha! ha's! A woman buried her face in a blue cotton towel and made no sign or movement, while two moxa cones were burning down and into her flesh. A young man started to rock to and fro when the fire began entering into his very bones, but soon stopped it, braced himself, and sat motionless. The priest, having set his seal on his victims, sat down by a brazier, put on his big spectacles, and was lost in reading a pious book, wholly indifferent to the row of backs frizzling beside him. This mine priest has some secret of composition for his moxa dough that has kept it in favor for many years, and about the only revenue of the temple is from his patients' fees. For rheumatism, lumbago, and such aches and ills it is most beneficial, and gives quick relief to any one heroic enough to endure it. The Japanese resort to moxa for almost everything that ails them, and one sees coolies with their backs and the calves of their legs covered with moxa scars. Foreign doctors have discovered the virtues of the treatment for certain things, and in Paris many cases of paralysis have been successfully treated. Charles Sumner having been one of the famous cases, whose paralyzed nerves were revived by the moxa. A variation of the treatment used in Paris under the name of moxa consists in burning with white-hot irons, which is much less painful than with paste cones, and Clara Morris was one of the best advertised subjects undergoing the white-iron moxa. When the patients descended from the moxa room, put on their sandals, and muttered a sullen prayer toward the open door of the temple, they were hardly to be identified with the gay people who had arrived earlier; and when they walked, it was plain by the way they held their shoulders, that the raw places still smarted.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

BOGUS COATS-OF-ARMS.

Americans Who Decorate Their Houses With Armorial Bearings.

Coats-of-arms are much used now in house decoration. In one of the grand old houses in Westchester County, which like its first owners has seen vicissitudes, the family arms are painted on glass over the front door, and the decoration remains there where it has been for a hundred years. This fashion is often followed in halls of private houses, but principally in mosaic instead of painted glass. In country houses the coat-of-arms often forms part of a large window in the hall. A window of this kind recently finished by a well-known firm in this city, for a private house in one of the Eastern cities, shows two full-lengths, life-sized female figures, while in the two upper lights are the coats-of-arms and crests of each side of the family. In a smaller window representing a graceful figure of a woman, with a border, the arms were displayed in the upper corners and repeated in the lower ones. In a handsome country house on the Hudson the long, broad hall has a large fire-place at one end, on one side of which is a small stained-glass window containing the arms of the owner, and on the other side a window containing those of his wife.

Next to the hall window the library offers an appropriate field, and a popular one for the display of heraldic designs, and several houses in this city have libraries in which the arms form the whole of a small window, or a panel in a large one. Many families, who care little for display but regard a coat-of-arms as an honorable possession, have them illumiuated on white paper, simply framed, and hung in an inconspicuous place in dining room or library. A far less ostentatious way of exhibiting arms than in stained glass is in carved wood. Panels carved with such designs are sometimes inserted in doors, buffets, cabinets, chair backs or as part of a border to a wainscoting. This is either done in relief or incised. In a trypitch of mahogany, intended for a portrait, a brass panel inserted over the doors was engraved with a crest. Panels of wood or brass or tile, decorated with the coat-of-arms, may be used in any way that fancy suggests, the mantlepiece seeming particularly appropriate for armorial designs.

China for the table is often decorated with the arms, or with the crest above the initial or monogram, and where the house linen is made to order the arms are frequently woven in with other designs. Embroidery offers the largest field, perhaps, for such decorations. Aside from the smaller articles on which arms may be embroidered, and which ladies find so necessary to their comfort, such as sofa-pillows, foot-stools, sachets, pinchushions, mouchoir cases and the like, the coat-of-arms may be seen to great advantage on a screen. On a low fire screen it would, of course, be the sole design and occupy the entire space, but on a higher screen it would be appropriate as part of a panel or border. A firm on Fifth avenue has recently embroidered on a satin bedquilt a coat-of-arms requiring very brilliant coloring; the effect is very handsome. On portieres the design is effective, whether used as a centerpiece or in the border, as it is, also, on the back of an upholstered chair.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

TO PREVENT EXPLOSIONS.

Valuable Suggestions for Dwellers in the Natural Gas Districts.

The following suggestions for avoiding explosions are offered by a natural-gas expert:

"To light fire, place a small piece of burning paper or other flame upon the grate or burner, and then turn on the gas, separately at first, afterward regulating flame as desired.

"Should gas fail to ignite at once, turn it off, open the damper and draft wide, and wait for a few moments, allowing the unconsumed gas to pass up the chimney before making another attempt to light fire.

"Never introduce flame in any form into a stove into which gas has first been turned.

"Always see that the valves are closed and open damper for a moment before lighting gas, to ventilate the stove or furnace. It is easy to cultivate this habit, and its observance is a good method of insurance against accident.

"Observe invariably the simple rule—Flame first, gas afterward.

"As a rule the best service is obtained by keeping bottom drafts closed tightly at all times, and damper in pipe nearly closed, but at night leave dampers nearly open.

"Do not turn fires too low at night. Leave them burning moderately.

"It is not necessary to fill stoves or furnaces with broken fire brick or any other substance. On the contrary, as a rule, better service is obtained by leaving burners bare and unobstructed except in open grates, and it is much safer. But where consumers insist upon 'filling,' great care must be observed not to clog the burner openings, which might cause a dangerous escape of gas through the mixers.

"There should be no odor of gas in the house. If any is detected turn out fires at once, ventilate thoroughly, and notify the company promptly.

"Should fires go out by reason of gas supply failing, close valves at all fires immediately."—Indianapolis Journal.

Out of the Swim.

Young Mr. Waldo (of Boston)—Are you going into society very much this season, Miss Breezy?

MET HIS MATCH.

A Book-Agent Invades a Railroad Office and is Worsted.

A rather shabbily dressed man with a large book under his arm, inserted his nose into the orifice through which railroad tickets at the Union Depot at Austin are sold.

"What can I do for you?" asked Pete Lawless, the genial ticket agent.

"How much does a ticket to Dallas cost?"

"Seven dollars and fifty cents."

"Well, I've got all but the seven dollars."

"That's hardly enough."

"Look here, my friend, I'm a book-agent, and I got roped into a little game of poker and want to get out of town. Now, if I stay here I'll have to drum, and I'm a terror. I've talked lots of people into the lunatic asylum. You don't want me to talk you silly, do you?"

"Suppose you try."

"In the interest of the people of Austin you want to help me leave this town. My staying here a week will retard its growth ten years."

"So you are really a book-agent. What book are you selling?"

A galvanized smile spread over the man's face, like a lot of butter on a hot batter cake, and in a sing-song voice he remarked:

"I am offering the public, in seventeen volumes, 'Dr. Bumblebee's Observations in Palestine,' a book that should be in every household; a book that not only contains the views of the learned savant on what he saw in the Holy Land, but numerous speculations and theories about what he did not see, altogether forming a complete library of deep research, pure theology and chaste imagery. I am not selling this incomparable encyclopedia, but am giving it away at a ridiculously low figure——"

The agent paused. He expected that the ticket agent would be bored, but he was not. On the contrary, he seemed to be amused and pleased.

"Hadn't you better give me a ticket, instead of having me talk you to death?"

"Talk me to death! Why, man alive, I like to hear it. Say that over."

"Say it over?" queried the bewildered book-agent.

"Yes; I was a book-agent myself, before I went into the railroad business, and what you say is music to me. It calls back hallowed memories of the past, and makes me want to go on the road again. Why, man alive, I could listen to you all day. I wouldn't have you leave Austin for any thing. Come around every day, and we will swap experiences."

The book-agent closed his book with a bang, and faded away like a beautiful dream in the direction of a saloon where they set out free lunch. He had met his match for once.—Texas Siftings.

CONCERNING VISIONS.

Some of the Disagreeable Results of an Abnormal Condition of the Brain.

The brain is a very delicate and complex machine and, of course, is the more liable to get out of order because of its delicacy and complexity. The musical expert, however skillful, can produce only discord if his instrument is out of order. So with the instrument of the mind. A disordered brain produces no harmony, however learned, exalted and good the subject. The sad facts of insanity are familiar to all. But there are also mental states, not usually regarded as insane, when the mind certainly is not in its normal condition.

For instance, one thinks he hears voices distinct and familiar, and yet they proceed wholly from the person's own brain. Another listens, charmed, to sweetest music, without a suspicion of its internal origin. Others, fully awake and in broad daylight and in ordinary health, see—or seem to see, without a doubt of its reality—in their room, or advancing toward the house, a friend who is really miles away, or even in another world. Some, as soon as they close their eyes, though awake, are tormented with the most distinct appearances of hideous-looking men; while others see the most lovely forms.

These visions may or may not be of frequent occurrence. Some persons are able to recognize their unreal character; others can not reason themselves out of a conviction of their being veritable flesh and blood.

The Medical Record, not long ago, gave an account of nocturnal visions which for a long time disturbed a lady over ninety years of age. She was apparently in good health and was not in the habit of using opium or alcohol. Every night a group of gayly-dressed people would come to her sleeping-room and remain till morning. Some of them would sit and look at her, and the young women, clad in light, handsome dresses, and with gay caps and bonnets, would talk in a low tone and smile and hang wet flowers over her pictures or doors, and try to pass from room to room. They were not rude, but would not leave the apartments when ordered to do so. The old lady was not only annoyed by this violation of her privacy, but also felt disturbed when she thought how unwholesome it was to have so many persons in her room at night. The physician, believing the trouble to be due to defective nourishment of the brain, administered to her, a short time before retiring, an appropriate remedy, which was followed by immediate improvement. These visions doubtless occurred to her in dreams, which occupied very brief periods; but probably the condition of her brain was similar to that of those who see visions when awake, and all such cases might be benefited by proper treatment.—Youth's Companion.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Hogs fattened on barley are reported to make superior meat with a large proportion of lean.

—Ducks usually begin to lay in February. They require a warm house, with leaves or cut straw upon which to sleep at night, as damp quarters are injurious to them.

—Common home-made lye soap, well mixed with cornmeal to a stiff dough, and given every few days, is now recommended as preventive and sure cure of chicken cholera.

—Sheep here do not pay as great profits as those in England. Every things depends upon the mode of management. Our farmers compel sheep to forage, while in England they are treated as carefully as are cattle.

—The seed of sorghum cane should be more extensively used. It may be ground or fed whole, if well cleaned. For poultry it is excellent, and as the yield of seed is from fifteen to twenty-five bushels per acre, it is really a very valuable portion of the crop.

—A heavy sod, plowed when there is a thin slice of frozen soil among the grass roots, makes a particularly mellow seed bed in spring. The frost works it down about as well as working on it half the summer could do.—American Cultivator.

—Keep cream apart from any strong-smelling vegetables, as nothing so rapidly absorbs odors as milk or cream. Never put it into a jar that has had vinegar, pickle or acids in it, until the jar is thoroughly cleansed and aired. The best plan is to have a jar especially for it, and be very particular that it is often thoroughly washed and aired.

—An Ohio girl, who tired of hearing the farmers in her section growl about wheat growing not paying, decided she'd see about it. She rented 5½ acres of land, kept strict account of every dollar expended in raising the crop, got an average yield of thirty-five bushels to the acre, and sold it for $142.10. The cost of production was $98.12, including $31.50 for fertilizers, and the gain on the investment was forty-four per cent.

—For gooseberry tarts, pour the juice off a can of green gooseberries, set it on the stove, wet a tablespoonful of corn starch with a little cold juice, and add to the juice on the stove when it boils, stir over the fire till it thickens, remove, add to the gooseberries, sweeten, and bake as cherry tarts. When done, cover with a meringue of white of egg and sugar, and return to the oven till it begins to color.

—Spanish Cream: This is one of the most delicious desserts. Put half a box of gelatine into a quart of sweet milk, keep in a warm place until the gelatine is dissolved; to this add the well-beaten yelks of four eggs, and one teacupful sugar. When scalding hot, but not boiling, stir in the whites, beaten to a froth. Flavor with lemon or vanilla. Pour into a mold, and set away in a cool place to stiffen. Of course it is to be eaten cold.

—A Colorado farmer recommends a somewhat novel method of preventing the loss of water by evaporation from open tanks or ponds. It consists in giving the surface of the water a thin coating of oil, and was successfully adopted by him during the unusual drought of last summer. He demonstrates the correctness of his theory by filling two vessels of equal size with the same depth of water and pouring a few drops of oil on the water of one. In due course the water in the other vessel will entirely evaporate, while the one that was oiled shows no loss.

—Too many husbands seem to forget that their wives need labor-saving implements and machinery, that the farm house as well as the barn, the back yard as well as the barn yard should have conveniences for saving useless steps and burdensome drudgery. Here is a case plain enough for any husband to understand: A farmer near Gardner, Me., had allowed his wife to carry water from a distant spring for ten long years, but as soon as he had occasion to use the water for his cattle a pipe was laid and a force pump put into use. We fear there are not a few just such thoughtless husbands who will read this item and not see the point in it.—Southern Cultivator.

EXPENSIVE FLOWERS.

Roses That Were Sold at Eight Times Their Weight in Gold.

The cut flower business, which we might almost call another phase of floriculture, is perhaps greater in the United States than in any other part of the world. Certainly the use of cut flowers in New York for bouquets, baskets and other designs, is far greater than in either London or Paris, and the taste shown in their arrangement here is vastly superior. It is estimated that $3,000,000 was paid for cut flowers in New York in 1880, one-third of which was for rosebuds. Immense glass structures are erected in the suburbs for the special purpose of growing cut flowers to supply the bouquet-makers of the city. Not less than twenty acres of glass surface is devoted to the purpose of forcing roses alone during the winter months. At some seasons the prices paid for these forced rosebuds are perfectly astounding. One grower, of Madison, N. J., took into New York three hundred buds of the crimson rose known as "General Jacqueminot," for which he received at wholesale $300, and which, no doubt, were retailed at $1.50 to $2 each. A flower dealer in Fourteenth street, a few days before Christmas, received the only four of this same variety of rose that were offered in the city, and found a customer for them at $60, or $15 apiece, or eight times the value of their weight in gold.—Christian at Work.

TRAINING WILD BEASTS.

How Ferocious Animals Are Taught to Obey Their Keepers.

The training is simple, persistent and effective. The king of beasts when conquered is like a lamb, and the young lions are tamed one at a time. For several days the animal is well fed. He is tempted to thrust his fore paws out in front of the den. Over them is slipped a noose, and the feet are then firmly tied down. The lion at once begins to roar and thrash his tail and hind legs about the cage. After a time he quiets down and the keepers enters the den. With a dexterous movement a bag is drawn down over the lion's head. The keeper sometimes bestrides his back, and holds his seat by tightening his legs around the body and grasping the mane of the animal. In the head covering is usually a sponge, saturated with about eight ounces of chloroform. The lion will try to shake off the keeper, but is powerless when his fore paws are tied down. In a moment or two the beast becomes unconscious. Other trainers then enter the den. Great attention and care is exercised over the pulsations of the lion's heart. The pulse is felt under the lower jaw the same as in a horse. It is dangerous to etherize or chloroform an animal of the cat species too severely, and the instant the pulsations becomes at all feeble the dose has to be lightened.

When the keeper becomes satisfied that the animal is unconscious, they begin operations upon his teeth. The canine, bicuspids and incisors are cut off. It requires great dexterity to know how far in the crown to cut without laying the nerve bare. After the operations on the teeth are finished, the keeper clips the claws, and in a few moments the lion is bereft of his teeth and claws. A heavy collar and chain are fastened around his neck, and when he comes to consciousness he is a very different beast than before.

The keepers will enter the cage at short intervals after this, and should the lion attempt to spring the chain retards him, and the keeper at once administers a sharp rap with a raw-hide whip. The lion, deprived of his teeth and claws, soon becomes cowardly. He is kept well fed, and if too ferocious is drugged until he becomes used to his keeper's presence in the cage.

Tigers are more difficult to conquer. Their teeth and claws are cut off in a similar manner to those of the lion. Tigers are more treacherous, and will spring at a keeper unexpectedly and without any warning whatever. They are drugged and kept chained for a long time, and often flogged into submission.

Leopards and panthers are easily tamed. With the wolf and the hyena the keepers fear only the teeth. They are "dog-footed," and do not strike like a cat animal. Their teeth are cut, and a good club will do the rest.

The operation upon the long tusks of the baboon is so painful and apparently so inhuman as to call for Henry Bergh's interference. The keepers will secure a baboon's paws and legs and draw the creature close up to the bars of his cage. The head will be tied also. After he is made fast his long tusks are sawed off. The baboon is subject to tooth-ache, and his teeth are extremely sensitive. When the saw cuts through to the nerve the poor beast will utter the most piercing shrieks and howls. To allay the pain, toothache drops of oil of cloves, oil of cajuput and chloroform are poured in the teeth and tar rubbed on to keep out the air.

After the operation is over the keeper retreats, the fastenings are removed and the baboon allowed to recover. After such an operation the baboon seldom shows a disposition to attack a man. It is, therefore, not so wonderful after all that the man-eaters and all sorts of carniverous animals are paraded through the streets with keepers among them. Timid people should take heart and remember that animals clipped, drugged and chained in cages are not possessed of such ferocious instincts as those of their native wilds.—*Cor. SCIATICA.

Misery.—It is instructive to note from the catalogue of diseases that nine-tenths of fatal cases reach their chronic stage through a stupid indifference to a correct treatment when the system is first assailed. It is easily shown that thousands of lives could be saved.

NERVOUS PAINS.

Torture.—For instance: SCIATICA, which so sorely afflicts the human family, and which is defined to be neuralgia of the sciatic nerve, rheumatism of the hip-joint, or parts adjoining it, hip gout, pains in the loins and hips, even in its mildest form never seizes its prey without due warning.

SYMPTOMS.

Acute.—Sudden and acute pains in the hip and loins; redness, swelling, tenderness, soreness, fever, lameness and sometimes excruciating pains. The disease rapidly develops into chronic or inflammatory stage.

TREATMENT.

Cure.—Rub the parts affected thoroughly and vigorously with ST. JACOBS OIL; create a burning sensation by the friction of rubbing on the Oil; apply warmth; flannels wrung out in hot water.

$500 REWARD

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Chronic Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a nasal twang; the breath is offensive; smell and taste are impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood by physicians.

By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases of Catarrh, "cold in the head," Coryza, and Catarrhal Headache.

Sold by druggists everywhere; 50 cents.

"Untold Agony from Catarrh."

Prof. W. HAUSNER, the famous mesmerist, of Ithaca, N. Y., writes: "Some ten years ago I suffered untold agony from chronic nasal catarrh. My family physician gave me up as incurable, and said I must die. My case was such a bad one, that every day, towards sunset, my voice would become so hoarse I could barely speak above a whisper. In the morning my coughing and clearing of my throat would almost strangle me. By the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, in three months, I was a well man, and the cure has been permanent."

"Constantly Hawking and Spitting."

THOMAS J. RUSHING, Esq., 292 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I was a great sufferer from catarrh for three years. At times I could hardly breathe, and was constantly hawking and spitting, and for the last eight months could not breathe through the nostrils. I thought nothing could be done for me. Luckily, I was advised to try Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, and I am now a well man. I believe it to be the only sure remedy for catarrh now manufactured, and one has only to give it a fair trial to experience astounding results and a permanent cure."

Three Bottles Cure Catarrh.

ELI ROBBINS, Runyan P. O., Columbia Co., Pa., says: "My daughter had catarrh when she was five years old, very badly. I saw Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy advertised, and procured a bottle for her, and soon saw that it helped her; a third bottle effected a permanent cure. She is now eighteen years old and sound and hearty."

DURANC'S RHEUMATIC REMEDY

will positively cure rheumatism when everything else on earth fails. It is taken internally, and cures quickly and thoroughly without ruining the stomach. Price, one dollar a bottle or six bottles for five dollars. Sold by all druggists. Send for free 40-page pamphlet to R. R. HELPHENSTINE, Druggist, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Death of "Petroleum V. Nasby."

TOLEDO, O., Feb. 15.—D. R. Locke, editor of the Blade of this city, widely known as "Petroleum V. Nasby," died at 6:35 this morning. The immediate cause of his death was consumption. David Ross Locke was born at Vestal, Broome county, N. Y., September 20th, 1833, and hence was in his 55th year. His father, N. R. Locke, a veteran of the war of 1812, is still living in this city at the advanced age of 94 years. The father was one of the original anti-slavery men of the country, and young Locke inherited the intense hatred of the "peculiar institution" and love of freedom which made him such a power with his pen during the civil war. In his eleventh year he was apprenticed to the printing trade in the office of the Cortland (N. Y.) Courier. After serving his seven years he traveled through the United States, working at his trade and acting as a reporter. In 1852 he founded the Plymouth (Ohio) Advertiser, conducting it two years. 1856 he founded the Bucryus Journal, and afterwards was successively connected with the Mansfield Herald and Findlay Jeffersonian. He was editing the latter paper when the war broke out, and in its columns appeared the first numbers of the renowned "Nasby" letters, the first bearing the date of April 21, 1861. These political satires sprang at at once into tremendous popularity. They were copied into newspapers everywhere, quoted in speeches, read around the camp-fires of Union armies, and exercised enormous influence in molding public opinion North in favor of vigorous prosecution of the war. Secretary Boutwell declared in a speech at Cooper Union, New York, at the close of the war, that the success of the Union arms was due to three causes—"the army, the navy and the Nasby letters." Charles sumner declared: "Unquestionably they were among the influences and agencies by which disloyalty in all its forms was exposed and public opinion assured upon the right side. It is impossible to measure their value, Against the devices of slavery and its supporters, each letter was like a speech, or one of those songs which stir the people."

These letters were a source of the greatest delight to President Lincoln, who always kept them in his table drawer for perusal at odd times. Mr. Locke once raised a company of volunteers and applied to Gov. Brough, of Ohio, for a commission as captain, which was refused on the ground that he could do more good for the Union cause with his pen than in the field, The immense popularity of the Nasby letters led to the demand for Mr. Locke to enter the lecture field, and he appeared in all the principal cities of the North. Though, as he himself acknowledged, not master of oratory he always had crowded and delighted audiences. He was offered official positions by President Lincoln and also by President Grant, but steadi y declined, as his only ambition was in the editorial field. In 1865 he assumed charge of the Toledo Blade, first on a salary, afterward purchasing an interest and finally entire control. It had always been his design to found a great national weekly, which he now carried out. He was one of the founders of the Republican party in Ohio, and the Nasby letters were but part of the powerful work he did in political fields. He also did a vast deal of purely literary work, having written two or three successful plays, books of travels and many novels and sketches for his own paper. He was also a poet of no mean order, and several of his devotional poems can be found in various church hymnals.

Some four or five years ago his health began to fail after twenty-two years of arduous labor, and he gradually withdrew himself from active work. Since then he has written very little, save the occassional "Nasby" letters that have appeared and a few special articles, chiefly on prohibition. He became convinced that prohibition must be the final solution of the liquor question, and for six yeass has strongly advocated it in his paper, but always through non-partisan methods. He remained faithful to his Republican ideas and deprecated any attempt to build up a seperate prohibition party. Consumption was inherited, it being in his mother's family, and several brothers and sisters dying of it. Its approach was very slow, and it was not till last November that he was confined to the house. His literary labors and newspaper were very profitable and in his latter years he was largely interested in building and manufacturing in Toledo. His fortue is estimated at a million dollars, exclusive of the Blade. He was married while at Plymouth to Miss Martha Bodine, who, with their three sons, all grown to manhood, survives him. The eldest, Captain Robinson Locke, has been associated with his father on the Blade for the last dozen years, except while consul at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, to which office he was appointed by President Arthur.

Hannibal Hamlin on Lincoln.

Venerable Hannibal Hamlin, white and wrinkled with his eighty years, a life-long Republican, Vice-President with Abraham Lincoln and beloved and honored by Republicans all over the land, proved in a speech here last night that his political faith is unwavering. The occasion was a meeting of the Veteran Republican Club, which was organized after the first great triumph of the Republican party to commemorate the election of President Lincoln. The marvellous old man began thus:

"I thank God there is no vote of mine in thirty-four long years of Congressional life that was not for freedom," Speaking to the young men present he beggeu of them to "shun the Democratic party as they would a viper. The Democratic party is not one whit more patriotic or more honest to-day than in the closing days of Buchanan's administration. I do not know but the Democratic party of to-day is worse than the Democratic party of 1860.

"Abraham Lincoln was President of the United States. Now if you think that all over, it is very comprehensive. When you recall that he had such men in his Cabinet as William H. Seward and Salmon P. Chase, yet towered above all others and dominated them all, you will get a little idea of the meaning of the fact that Abraham Lincoln was President and not his Cabinet. I will call to your minds a historical fact. Almost the very first days of the organization of his administration the question was presented to his Cabinet whether Fort Sumpter should be surrendered or not and the Cabinet voted yes, but Abraham Lincoln voted no, and the fort was not surrendered. I state that fact because it has not been stated historically, I cannot say how many, bnt in a great many other instances the whole direction of the government was controlled by Abraham Lincoln, with his Cabinet not in harmony with him."

The emancipation proclamation, Mr. Hamlin said, was "the act of Lincoln and nobody else; not the act of his Cabinet. I was urging him in season and out of season to issue that proclamation, but the time had not come. I happened to be in Washington just before it became known that it was to be issued, and at Mr. Lincoln's desire accompanied him to his study, and he said that I had been urging him at all times to issue an emancipation proclamation. Then said he: "I think the time has about come, Mr. Hamlin, and as you have said a good deal about it I am going to show it to you as the first man who has ever read it. No member of my Cabinet has seen it.' So I use the language that it was Abraham Lincoln's proclamation and not the proclamation of his Cabinet."—Portland, (Me.) Telegram.

A Wonderful Invention.

Baltimore Sun.

There was a meeting yesterday of the Electro-Automatic Transit Company of Britimore City. It was decided to build a test line for the rapid delivery of newspapers, mails and express matters generally. The mechanical contrivence, under the new system of rapid transit invented by David G. Weems, of this city, and controlled by the above named company, bids fair to revolutionize the world in this respect.

It is very simple, consisting of a light structure, elevated some 20 feet from the ground, thereby offering no hindrance to the cultivation of fields over which it may pass, Cars, pointed at both ends, are run on two tracks which acts in the two-fold capacity of a guide rail, and the conductor of the electric current. Each car is provided with an upper or guide wheel at each end, whose flanges inclose the upper or guide rail on each side, thus rendering the jumping of the track a matter of impossibility, The motive power consists of a permanent generator of certain prescribed horse-power, located at each end of the line, from which the current passes to the induction rail, where it is immediately taken up by the traveling motor, to which one or more cars may be attached. The whole train is automatic in its action, each car springing its own brakes in succession, in passing a permanent trip-lever, located at a sufficient distance from the stopping place, after the train has already passed a point where the electric current is cut off permanently, leaving the train to its own momentum only, when the brakes are automatically applied. By the proposed line Baltimore newspapers, mail matter or express packages would reach Chicago in about two hours. Chicago is distant from Baltimore 801 miles by rail. Matter from San Francisco to New York would be nine hours in transit.

A Female Bandit.

The death is announced of one of the most remarkable women that Mexico has ever produced. Notwithstanding her strange and perilous career she attained a ripe old age and became one of the wealthiest women in the Republic. This woman was Senora Amastia Rubio de Pascadero. In her early womanhood she devoted her time to robbery, and if half the reports regarding her career are true it is no wonder that she left a vast fortune at her death. One of her most notable exploits was a stage robbery in the State of Zacatecas.

One night she dressed herself in men's clothing, and mounting a horse rode from the little town of San Antonio to the Racatecas and Aques Calantes stage road, where she waited in a small mesquite grove for the south-bond stage to pass. As the postillions came up she commanded them with a revolver in hand to halt, put out their torches and fall into the rear of the coach, which was a few yards behind them. She then advanced upon the driver and keeper who were made to dismount, expecting every moment to be shot from ambush as she kept saying, "Don't shoot unless they offer resistance."

The passengers, eight in number who were inside the stage were led to believe from the female road agent's conversation that an armed party was in the brish, and when she came up demanded their money, watches and jewelry they lost no time in obeying her. She then bade the passengers goodnight, and after admonishing them not to make a movement within half an hour disappeared in the grove. During her career she killed agreat many men, and for many long years was a terror to the people of Sinaloa, Jalisco and Sonora. Troops and State police chased her for years, but could never entrap her. It was stated that the reason she gave for adopting such a remarkable mode of life was the murder by Federal troops of her intended husband years ago, when she was in her teens. She then made a vow that she would kill or ruin five men for every year she should be permitted to live. She was one of the most desperate bandits Mexico ever produced, notwithstanding she was a woman. Before her death she related her strange history and bequeathed her immense fortune to charities. At her request she was buried beside her dead lover in her native town, San Antonio.

Caught at Last.

Boston Courier.

"It must be very lonesome sitting all by yourself in your office balancing your books at night, John," said an affectionate wife.

"It is, my darling."

"I have been thinking about it for some time and now I have got a delightful surprise for you."

"A delightful surprise?"

"Yes, dear. I sent for my mother yesterday, and I expect her every minute. I mean to have her stay with us quite a while. She will take care of the house at night and look after the children and I can go down town and sit in your office with you while you work."

"The dev—that is to say I couldn't think of your going down town"—

"It is my duty, dear John. I ought to have thought of it before, but it never came to my mind till yesterday. Oh, John, forgive me! Forgive me for not thinking of your comfort sooner. But I will go with you to-night."

"To-night? Why, I—I—the fact is I got through with my books last night."

"Oh, you did! How delightful! And you can now stay at home every evening! I'm so glad!"

And the delightful wife ran off to make preparation for the reception of her mother, while her husband with sombre brow sat staring at the coals in the grate, in which he could see the picture of a mother-in-law's reproving face and a poker party with a vacant chair.

"All is over between us, Mr. Sampson," she said coldly. "The presents you have given me will be returned to-morrow."

He stood there proudly, but his face was ashen.

"Every thing shall be returned," she went on, with a queenly sweep of her rounded arm, "with the exception, of course, of the caramels and ice-cream."

And thus they parted.—N. Y. Sun.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

THE Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright: It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.

TAKE SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

TORPID LIVER

Is known by these marked peculiarities:

1. A feeling of weariness and pains in the limbs.
2. Bad breath, bad taste in the mouth, and furred tongue.
3. Constipation, with occasional attacks of diarrhœa.
4. Headache, in the front of the head; nausea, dizziness, and yellowness of skin.
5. Heartburn, loss of appetite.
6. Distention of the stomach and bowels by wind.
7. Depression of spirits, and great melancholy, with lassitude and a disposition to leave everything for to-morrow.

A natural flow of Bile from the Liver is essential to good health. When it is obstructed it results in which, if neglected, soon leads to serious diseases. Simmons Liver Regulator exerts a most felicitous influence over every kind of biliousness. It restores the Liver to proper working order, regulates the secretion of bile and puts the digestive organs in such condition that they can do their best work. After taking this medicine no one will say, "I am bilious."

BILIOUSNESS,

"I have been subject to severe spells of Congestion of the Liver, and have been in the habit of taking from 15 to 20 grains of calomel which generally laid me up for three or four days. Lately I have been taking Simmons Liver Regulator, which gave me relief without any interruption to business."—J. HUGG, Middleport, Ohio.

ROOM AT THE TOP.

"Tell you how I commenced in life? Certainly. Sit down and make yourself comfortable. You look thoroughly disheartened for a young man."

"I am discouraged, Mr. Myers. I have tried every day for six weeks to get a position, and there is none to be had. Tis is the sum and substance of the whole matter."

As he spoke David Edwards dropped into the proffered chair. The bright carpet, glowing grate and comfortable atmosphere of Lawyer Myers' cozy library were home-like and attractive, especially to the young man who had spent the whole day out in the rain trying to secure a paying position.

"There is no use," he said, with a long-drawn sigh. "I've tried for the last time. Prosperity is not for everybody."

Lawyer Myers laid down his evening paper.

"You have asked me to tell you how I got started, and I will. And I want you to profit by the rehersal.

"After I had taken my course of law, had graduated with honors and obtained my diploma, I supposed myself qualified to enter upon the duties of a professional man. So I packed my satchel, and came to the city to look for an opening.

"The first man I applied to was Colonel Hawkins, the now famous criminal lawyer. He was a particular friend of one of the professors, and I supposed that my diploma would be all the introduction I should need—that he would actually take me into his confidence at once."

"You discovered your mistake, I presume," interrupted the young man in a dejected tone.

"Yes, I discovered it, I went to the Colonel and told him my plans. I shall never forget the look he gave me. A look over a pair of steel-rimmed spectacles that made me feel as though I was about the size of a spindle.

"'Young man,' he said, in a sonorous tone that made me shiver, 'take my advice and never enter law! The profession is crowded to death! Men are actually starving, sitting in their office chairs, waiting for clients! There is no money in it, sir. Lawyers have had their day, and the rising generation must look up a new business.'

"With that he bowed and dismissed me.

"Of course I did what any other young man would have done under similar circumstances—went back to the cheerless room on the third floor of my boarding house, with the blues. I considered Colonel Hawkins an autocrat. If he said there was no chance in the profession, I accepted it as a foregone conclusion."

"What did you do then, sir?" asked David, his interest already becoming aroused.

"I was going to tell you what I did. While I sat there feeling so homesick, and wishing that I had never been born, Mrs. Green, my landlady, came in. She wanted to know what the trouble was, and I told her. She said Colonel Hawkins ought to know and advised me to abandon the idea of trying law. I was subject to advice, and I accepted counsel.

"'But,' she said, 'cheer up. I can get you a position in a bank. I am sure of that, if you want it.'

"Of course I wanted it. So she wrote a note to one of the bankers of the city, inclosed a letter of introduction, and sent me out again, not forgetting to add the usual 'best wishes for success.'

"I have often thought of it! How I put my hand on the railing and stepped into that bank that afternoon! Confidence lifting my feet as on a carpet of down. Imagination measuring the size of the bank I would be proprietor of in a few years.

"I handed my letter to a clerk, and he delivered it to some one behind a desk. Then he took his hat and went out, and I stood there and waited an hour at least.

"Finally a gray-haired old gentlemen came out and said:

"'You are the young man who brought this letter. I believe?'"

"Yes, sir"

"'Ahem! Yes; well please say to Mrs. Green that I am sorry not to be able to do her the favor, but we have no vacancies at present.'"

"I made no reply. Only stood and looked at him.

"'Young man,' he said at last, 'take my advice and never attempt to learn banking. You could hope for nothing better than the position of book-keeper for years, if ever; and it is nothing but a dog's life. Besides the business is crowded sir. There are more banks than there are people to support them. Every paper you pick up is full of bank failures.'

"And he bowed me out.

"I went back to Mrs. Green and told her the resnlt

"'Well,' she said. 'Mr. Switzer ought to know. He has been in the business thirty years. How would you like to be a druggist?'

"I told her I would like anything thing that was a paying business. She had a friend who was a druggist and she was positive he wanted a clerk.

"So she wrote another note and letter of introduction and sent me off to her druggist friend.

"I walked over this time and it was just as well. The position had been filled before I got there.

"But just as I turned to leave the store, the proprietor, who was quite an old man, stopped me and said:

"Young man, don't spend an hour trying to be a druggist. I have been in the business forty years and I know what I am talking about. You've got to work like a slave, night and Sundays not excepted, and probably in the end get sued for damages on account of some careless prescription clerk. Besides the business is overdone already. You will find a drug store springing up on every other corner. Take my word for it there is no money in drugs.'

"That night I sat in my room trying to decide which way to turn next when Charlie Griffin, the fellow who roomed next to me, dropped in.

"'Got the blues?' he asked.

"'Yes, I have,' I answered with a great, deep sigh. 'I am perfectly sick of the whole of it.'

"'O, pshaw,' he said, in a cheerful tone that brightened me a little, 'there are plenty of chances. You will get in somewhere. I believe the book business would just suit you. Why don't you try that?'

"'I hadn't thought of it,' I replied.

"'Well, that will be just the thing for you,' he said with great confidence. I can help you on that too! I am acquainted with a man in the book business and he wants a partner. There is your chance. I will go down with you in the morning and give you an introduction.'

"Then he rattled on for half an hour about subscription books and all other kinds of books. The fortunes that had been made out of them and the chances there were for young men in the business, and I went to bed with renewed hopes.

"The next morning we went down to the office. Charlie introduced me and told the proprietor I wanted to learn the business.

"'Want to learn the book business!' he exclaimed, as though there were something terrible in the very thought. 'If you had the experience I have you would never try handling books! It is the most tantalizing business on earth. Take a new subscription book, for instance. It treats of a popular topic and you know there is money in it. The books take, the agent secures large orders and everything looks prosperous. But wait till the delivery comes.—Some of the subscribers have changed their minds, some of them moved away, and probably those whom the agent felt the surest of will have diptheria or scarlet fever so that he cant's see them at all? The result is, two-thirds of the books come back on your hands. It is the most discouraging business in existence. I don't want any partner. I want to sell out.'

"'Do you know of any opening in any kind of business?'

"'No, sir, I don't he replied with a wild shake of the head. 'Every profession and every branch of business under the sun is overcrowded! There is not even a possibility of success in anything.'

Charlie went back to his work and I went back to my boarding house.

"'Mrs. Green,' I said, in a defiant tone, 'will you trust me for my board for two months!'

"'Why, yes, Mr. Myers, I will trust you,' she replied. What are you going to do?'

"'I am going to open a law office. I have spent my time and money in fitting myself for a profession, and I propose to follow it and make a living out of it.'

"That afternoon I rented a small office and commenced business for myself. I have followed the practice of law ever since and I have prospered. Any young man can do the same. Ask neither sympathy, assistance nor advice, but qualify yourself for the vocation you wish to follow, and then go to work in earnest.

"Daniel Webster only voiced the experience of a lifetime when he replied to a young man who asked him if there was a chance in his profession:

"'Yes, sir, there is room at the top.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Death Preferred to Disgrace.

ALLIANCE, O., Feb. 22.—Charles Wingard, aged 24, and Miss Anna Fox, his niece, aged about 16 years, who were arrested here on last Monday for eloping from Monroe, Mich., committed suicide this morning about 10 o'clock. Sheriff Eaton, of Monroe, arrived here this morning and identified the prisoners. Chief of Police Stacy of this city and Sheriff Eaton had a conversation with the prisoners and requested them to go back to Michigan without a requisition. They asked for a short time in private to decide on what they should do, and the officers left them alone for a few minutes. On returning to the prison they found Anna dead and Wingard in a dying condition.

There was a bullet-hole in the forehead of the girl and one through the top of Wingard's head, made by a 32-calibre revolver. A note was found stating that they had decided to kill themselves rather than go back to Monroe, and that they had taken their own lives.

After coming here Wingard succeeded in obtaining employment as a fireman on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago railroad. The couple secured board at Reader's boarding-house and passed off as man and wife. Becoming frightened they fled to canton last week, where they were arrested by Officer Stacy on Monday and brought here. It is understood that both parties are highly connected in Monroe.

THE YOUNGEST CAT.

A small bright face, two roundgreen eyes,
A fluffy head as soft as silk,
Two ears pricked up in swift surprise,
Two whiskered lips to drink the milk.
So sleek, so quick, so fair, so fat,
There's nothing like the youngest cat.

She has no reverence for the rest;
Plays unconcerned with Sambo's tail;
Pulls gently at Lord Earnest's crest—
A feat that turns her mother pale.
He growls and bites. What of that?
She's safe up high, our youngest cat.

Then creeping round the sofa back,
She pats her mistress with her paw;
Disturbs the monarch, sleek and black,
Whose lightest mewings once were law:
He wakes; he spits. She's reached the mat
And flown out-doors, that youngest cat.

She's here, she's there, she's everywhere;
No spot is sacred from the pet.
Of food she takes the lion's share:
She rushes where the saucer's set;
The mouse she claims; she hoards the rat
Within his hole—the youngest cat.

She climbs the desk, she spills the ink,
Then chases swift the lagging pen.
We put her down, but, ere we think,
She's up and at the game again.
An author's words come scarcely pat
When walked o'er by the youngest cat.

A tease, a joy, a plague, a dear—
Her names are many as her tricks,
We chase her off, then call her near:
The rest look on as cross as sticks.
No house is dull, be sure of that,
Which always holds a youngest cat.

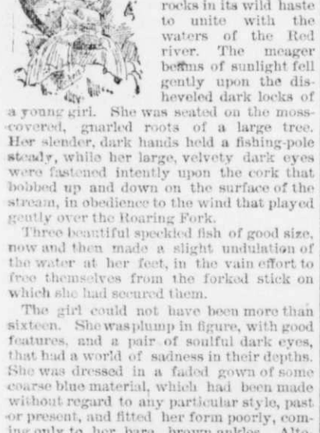
UP ROARING FORK.

A Mountain Tale of Love and Adventure.

[Written for This Paper].

HE sun's rays filtered through the dense foliage of the trees on the banks of Roaring Fork, where that boisterous stream flowed noisily over rocks in its wild haste to unite with the waters of the Red river. The meager beams of sunlight fell gently upon the disheveled dark locks of a young girl. She was seated on the moss-covered, gnarled roots of a large tree. Her slender, dark hands held a fishing-pole steady, while her large, velvety dark eyes were fastened intently upon the cork that bobbed up and down on the surface of the stream, in obedience to the wind that played gently over the Roaring Fork.

Three beautiful speckled fish of good size, now and then made a slight undulation of the water at her feet, in the vain effort to free themselves from the forked stick on which she had secured them.



The girl could not have been more than sixteen. She was plump in figure, with good features, and a pair of soulful dark eyes, that had a world of sadness in their depths. She was dressed in a faded gown of some coarse blue material, which had been made without regard to any particular style, past or present, and fitted her form poorly, coming only to her bare, brown ankles. Altogether, she was a wild, dark little creature, that looked not unlike a natural part of that picturesque sylvan scene round about the Roaring Fork, and might have been taken for a larger sister to the beautiful wild flowers that bloomed in such prodigality on its banks.

A footstep fell on the hearing of the girl. She turned her head in the direction from whence the sound came. A man was coming towards her. The girl recognized him at once and a deep frown broke the calm of her countenance.

The man that approached her was a handsome, devil-may-care sort of fellow, thirty-five years of age or thereabouts, tall and graceful in manners, with golden hair and whiskers, and restless, penetrating eyes of gray. A somewhat cruel, sardonic expression constantly hovered around his small mouth, and, just now, as he stopped above her on the bank, it seemed to expand and render his handsome face more repellent to the girl, whose dark eyes strove to read his thoughts.

For several moments he occupied a graceful attitude on the bank overlooking the girl's retreat without speaking. Neither did she utter a word, nor give any sign that he was near her, other than to fix her wondrous eyes upon him in distrust and repulsion.

At length the fellow broke into a laugh, not pleasant by any means, and he said: "You don't like me, Wild Bird of the Roaring Fork, do you?"

"YOU DON'T LIKE ME, DO YOU?"

"You don't reckon I hev any call ter like ye, do ye, Bert Coles?" she retorted, her eyes blazing.

"Well, really, now, that is a somewhat embarrassing question," he replied, mockingly. "I supposed that missionary fool you started to school to had taught you it is a Christian duty to love everybody."

"That don't mean fur us ter love ther ugly doin's an' hoss stealin', an' whisky smugglin'," answered the girl, speaking slowly. The man bit his lips to suppress the anger her implied charges called up, while big tears welled up in the girl's eyes as she remembered the kind missionary to whom she had been sent to school two years ago, but from which she had been recalled to the deathbed of her mother. She had never returned to school, deeming it her duty to stay with her lonely father, in his little cabin far up the wild Roaring Fork.

Bert Coles evidently deemed it wisest to change the subject, for he said:

"Well, Lenita, I can tell you one thing worth heeding. You won't catch a single fish as long as the wind bobs your cork that way, if you sit there till your raven tresses turn white as those blossoms over yonder," and he laughed again.

"You don't know nothin' erbout it, Bert Coles," she returned. "I've ketched three already, an' another's been nibblin'; but your talk's sorter scart him, I guess."

"Which, I suppose, is a mild hint that I should either 'button my lip' or decamp instanter; eh, Lenita?" he asked, leaning coolly back against a large pecan tree that spread its green branches over the girl, and sent darkling shadows out over the water before her.

"The trees is better company fur me 'an some folks is," replied the girl, with a flash in her eyes.

"Thank you," he returned, and his laugh rang out more pleasantly as he removed his broad-brimmed hat and gracefully ran one shapely white hand through his golden curls. "Your frankness is quite refreshing, Lenita. Had I heard more frankness and less flattery from your sex years ago, I might not now be what I am, an outlaw from justice, hiding here in the Indian Territory," and the man rested his head against the palm of his hand, while his thoughts were of his past, its lost opportunities, its course of reckless dissipation.

Lenita remained silent. Her eyes wandered across the Roaring Fork to the opposite bank, where the alder's snowy, flaky blossoms nodded to and fro in the warm south wind, and a red bird whisked among the branches. The girl possessed little learning, but she was of a thoughtful turn of mind. As she looked at the wild flowers, so white, emblems of purity, and the red bird so industrious, the secret of content and happiness, Lenita wondered why man, endowed by our Father above with so great intelligence, so rarely possessed the simple purity of the alder blooms, and attained to the happiness of the bird.

A heavy sigh from the man recalled her. She had almost forgotten that she was not alone.

"Where is your father to-day, Lenita?" he asked, after several moments of silence.

"He was at the cabin when I come away," answered the girl, fixing her dark eyes full upon him. "But I want ter tell ye, Bert Coles, I don't want you-uns ter git my pap inter no more devilment. You know well nuff what I mean. If you-uns will do what's 'gin the law, ye hev no bus'ness ter git others ter help yer in yer evil doin's. Pap 'ud do right well an' stick ter his religion if it wasn't fur you-uns. But he's that easy to gin in ter some body else's mind, that when you-uns comes eround our cabin with yer smooth tongue, he allus gin's in." Lenita had risen to her feet and stood with flushed face and flashing eyes confronting the handsome outlaw, who only smiled in his habitual fashion as she went on speaking. When she had finished he made her a courtesy, and, putting his hat on his head, he said:

"I am much obliged to you, Miss Lenita, for the oration just delivered, and although I should like to hear more, I am pressed for time and must leave you. However, I will think over what you demand, but not to-day," and he hurried off in the direction of the cabin, up the creek.

For a short time Lenita remained standing where Bert Coles had left her. After a while, she pulled out the fishing line, and removing the half devoured bait, she wrapped the line round and round the long cane stalk which served as fishing-pole. As she was thus engaged, the sound of a pony's hoofs striking the rocky path caught her ear. A moment later, a fleet-footed pony came into view on the opposite side of the Roaring Fork. The girl's dusky cheeks turned crimson as she recognized both pony and rider. The rider greeted the girl, and then he drew rein by the stream's side and allowed his pony to drink of the cool, limpid waters. He was a young man of twenty-one or two, perhaps, and sat his pony like a prince. The dark eyes, straight black hair and small jetty mustache that lent considerable beauty to his dusky face, all bespoke the Indian blood in his veins. He was dressed after the manner of the best educated and most civilized of the citizens of the Indian Territory, and not in the half fantastic style of costume supported by a certain class there. The belt, bristling with weapons, which encircled his waist, was not the insignia of border ruffianism, as is so often the case with young fellows so equipped. Scott Redleaf, as the young Chickasaw was called, was deputy sheriff in the district including the Roaring Fork region, where Lenita and her father lived in their isolated cabin.

Lenita knew Scott Redleaf well, and she had loved him for his manliness ever since the day, several months ago, when he had protected her from the insults of a debased character and drunken brute. Scott Redleaf, too, had been strangely drawn towards the lonely, unlearned girl in whose veins flowed some of the blood of his own nation, and he was very happy to have met her this morning.

After crossing the creek the young man sprang lightly from the saddle, and leaving the pony to feed on the grass that grew along the woodland path, he approached Lenita and told her his business there, in that part of the Roaring Fork.

Some ponies belonging to a ranchman in Texas had been run over the Red river into the Chickasaw Nation, and were believed to be concealed somewhere on the Roaring Fork. He told her that Bert Coles was the leader in the matter, and it was generally believed that her father was implicated and suspected of screening the chief of the outlaws and his gang.

"For your sake, Lenita, I am willing to let your father off on his promise to encourage such law-breaking no more," Scott Readleaf said, "but Bert Coles and his followers must suffer what penalties the law has in store for such criminals as he."

He did not ask Lenita if she knew any thing about the matter or could tell him of the whereabouts of the outlaw Coles. He had merely sought her out to warn her to put her father on his guard against the posse of men now scouring the country along the Roaring Fork to find the headquarters of the outlaws in hiding somewhere among its bold bluffs and deep gullies.

Bidding the girl good day, Scott Readleaf vaulted into his saddle and rode off towards the north, taking the opposite bank from the one on which the lone cabin of Joe Frenchy was situated.

Lenita gazed after the young fellow until the trees hid horse and rider from view. Then, fishing-rod in one hand and fish in the other, she walked up the noisy stream to her cabin home, a dark, uninviting abode amid a thicket of wild plum and trailing vines.

Joe Frenchy was leaning against his cabin, pipe in mouth, and hands thrust lazily into the pockets of his coarse jeans pants. He was a man of forty, tall and somewhat given to the bony order of humanity. His face, however, was bloated looking, revealing to an observer one who imbibed spirits or "bitters" to a considerable extent. His beard was scant and black. His hair and eyes, as well as his principal features, proved his Indian blood at once. Above his head, on the rude logs of the cabin, the skins of several wild animals were tacked to cure in the meagre rays of sunshine that penetrated to that tree-environed habitation. At his feet slept two lank, lean hounds that pricked their ears up as Lenita materialized down the path.

The stolid, bloated face of Joe Frenchy redeemed itself as his child came into sight. A moment before it had seemed nothing on earth had power to change th dull expression of his countenance. Now the lusterless eyes grew bright, and his whole face seemed to glow with different life. The power of love is beyond human estimate.

Joe Frenchy's acquaintances were wont to say that if it was not for the love he bore his motherless child, he would have gone to the dogs long ago. As it was, he had nearly done so anyway, despite the great affection he had for Lenita. Yet, that love was able to reclaim him to occasional reforms. He would break off from his evil associates and declare that he would never touch another drop of whisky again, and for a little time he would be truly happy in adhering to his resolves. But the tempters would come, Bert Coles and others, who understood just how to strike the weak cords of his nature, and, yielding to persuasion, he would do again the very things he had promised never to do more.

As Lenita put her fish aside, she asked:

"Was Bert Coles ter see you-uns, pap?"

"Yes, he war hyar," replied Frenchy, knocking the ashes out of his pipe against the side of the worm-eaten door. Entering the cabin, he laid his pipe up on a projection of a log over the fire-place. Then, putting on his coat, he prepared to go out again.

"Whar ye goin', pap!" asked Lenita, stopping in her arrangement of the rude, home-made furniture of the cabin.

"Just up the creek a ways, not fur," he replied, trying to evade her penetrating eyes, which sought his own so searchingly.

"Pap, yer needn't try ter fool me; you-uns air goin' among the hills up Roarn' Fork, ter holp Bert Coles run off them stold ponies he's tryin' to keep hid," and the girl looked dauntlessly into her father's face.

"Waal, what ef I air?" demanded Frenchy sullenly.

"O pap!" she cried, throwing her plump, brown arms around his neck, "Yer mus'n't go; please don't. The woods along Roarin' Fork air full of men tryin' ter fin' Bert Coles an' his gang. Scott Redleaf tole me so. He's a holpin' ter fin' him; he's dep'ty, ye know. He says you-uns air 'spected o' holpin' the hoss thieves, some, but if you keep away from them he'll let yer off fur my sake. So, stay ter home, pap," she pleaded.

"I done gin my word ter Bert to show him the gully whar Barney's gang usen ter run thar 'still'ry, up thar, 'fore they got scart out by the off'cers; an' I 'lew I'll do it. Thar, thar! Don't cry, Lenita. I'll promise yer never ter holp Bert again. But I mus' this time, shuah. Fur ef I don't he'll burn me out or do somethin' wuss."

"O, PAP!" SHE CRIED, "YER MUS'N'T GO!"

"Why, pap, ef that's all yer feard of, don't go," said the girl through her tears. "I'd druther be burnt out an' hev ter live in a holler tree like a 'possum, 'an ter holp do what's gin the law an' ain't right 'tall.

"But Bert's goin' ter gin me a heap o' money fur showin' him the gully up the creek this time, and if you-un's air a good girl, I'll spend it most all on gittin' yer new fixin's, ribbons an' sich," he said trying to pacify her.

"I don't need 'em, pap. All I want is fur you-uns ter do right."

"We kin live like fine folks, Bert says, if I'll holp him. W'y, Lenita, you-uns kin put on more style an' any gal along the Roarin' Fork, when I git that money," he said, trying to tear himself away from her clinging arms. But Lenita would not let him go.

"No, pap, you shan't go. Ye got ter stay ter home," she said, locking her arms more tightly around his neck.

Had it not been for the liquor Bert Coles had given him to drink in their interview, Joe Frenchy might have yielded to his child's entreaties. But, warmed by the fluid poison he had imbibed, her opposition roused a demon, and in freeing himself from her clasp, he flung her aside with too violent force, and she fell to the floor, a cry of pain escaping her as her head struck the rough boards. Frenchy did not look once upon his daughter to note the result of the fall; but he rushed out of the cabin and took the little flower-starred path up the Roaring Fork.

For a long time Lenita lay moaning on the floor, holding her hand to a slight wound on the side of her head. When she felt able, she sat up and looked around her. She had been partially unconscious before, but now she remembered everything, and a look of mental anguish settled upon her face. She tried to get up, but she was so dizzy she sat down again. When she felt somewhat recovered, she spoke aloud:

"I've a big notion ter leave him, a strikin' me down this a-way. But I done gin mother my word ter stick ter pap through thick an' thin, an' I reckon I'd be doin' ill ter up an' leave him alone by hisself. It'd hurt mother powerful-lik, in her angel home so fur frum the Roarin' Fork, ter see me go away frum pap, jest 'cause he struck me me down."

Then she managed, with the aid of a bench, to get upon her feet. She staggered to the door, where she got a pan of water. After bathing her head in the cool liquid she felt much better, and seated herself on the threshold of the cabin, where the balmy south air played softly over her face, like the touch of a loving friend.

"Poor pap!" she said, as big tears filled her eyes. "He'd been drinkin' some o' Bert Coles' smuggled whisky, or he'd never pushed me frum him so cruel like. He never treated me that way before; but he'll feel sorry fur it when he comes back ter himself. Poor pap!" and the girl wept as she thought of the probable fate of her father.

The day wore away. The sun went down, leaving the bluffs tinged with a wondrous halo of amber and purple. Lenita had nearly looked her eyes out, and yet Joe French did not come. Had any thing befallen him? Her mind pictured a hundred awful fates for him. Yet she waited in great mental torture, by the doorway, her dark eyes gazing far away into the gathering darkness, hoping to catch a glimpse of his figure coming home. Far into the night she watched and waited thus.

It must have been near midnight. Lenita was at her post. Suddenly Joe Frenchy appeared in view down the path. The rising moon partially lit up the woodland, and Lenita could see that he staggered as he approached the cabin, slowly and laboriously.

In a moment she was by his side, assisting him to gain the house.

"O, pap, yer shot!" she cried, as her strong young arms supported him across the threshold and to a rude couch in one corner of the cabin.

He sank upon the couch with a groan. Lenita stood over him with clasped hands.

"O, pap; air ye bad hurt?" she asked.

"Don't be scart, Lenita; but I reckon I'm purty well used up," he answered.

"How did it happen, pap?"

"It was up in the gully. We'd jest got the ponies run in when the cussed off'cers foun' us. It was sich a s'prise ter the hull of us-uns that we couldn't do nuthin' but break an' run. Bert an' me broke fur the woods. He got off without ary shot in him, but I got two loads in me," and he groaned heavily.

"O, pap! O, pap!" was all that the weeping girl could utter.

"Don't take on, Lenita. It's all my own blamed meanness. I wouldn't mind yer warnin', but throwed ye like an ole b'ar frum me ter the floor, an' went ter my fate. I only meant ter go this onct more, an' then break off. But I went onct too often. The Lowd never meant fur me tu prosper on money got frum Bert for holpin' him ter hide the ponies up the gully, an' he let the off'cers fin' us out; an' now I'm shot, an' the Lowd only knows what'll become of you, my girl," said Joe Frenchy, putting his big hand on the girl's bowed head.

"Never mind me, pap, but let me do something fur you-uns, ter stop yer pain an' sich," and the girl, brushing aside her tears, strove to make the suffering man rest easily.

Scarcely had she finished bathing his feverish brow, when the trampling of horses' feet was heard before the cabin door and the coarse voices of rough men broke simultaneously upon Lenita's hearing. Leaving her father's side, the brave girl stepped to the door just as a burly fellow with a Winchester in his hand came before it. A half-dozen other rough-looking men, all belonging to the Indian police, stood close behind him.

"That's Frenchy's gal," said one of the men.

"Air you-uns Joe Frenchy's darter?" asked the leader, halting before the girl.

"Yes, sir, I air," replied Lenita, placing herself in the door.

"Is yer daddy here?"

"He air."

"Tell him ter come out an' s'render ter onct," ordered the leader.

"O, sir! he kain't," cried the girl.

"Kain't, eh! I'll jest persuade him with this instermint, then," and he raised the revolver threateningly.

"Please, don't," she cried, never flinching, however, as the rough officer thrust the Winchester almost against her cheek.

"Then stand 'side, gal, an' let me tote him out."

"He's trying ter pet ther 'possum, Hi," spoke one of the men.

"No, he's not," put in Lenita. "He' shot; yer gang shot him twice, an' he's lyin' on the bed now, not able ter stand on his feet. O, men!" she appealed to them, "if you-uns hev hearts, please don't 'sturb him now. He's suffering so!"

"She's tryin' ter stan' you-uns off, while her dad crawls out at a winder an' 'scapes!" yelled a rough in the rear.

"That's a fac!" yelled another. "The gal's in with Bert Cole's gang, too, depen' on't. 'Rest her as a 'complice!"

"Yes, 'rest the gal, too. Go ahead, Hi!" came from another in the background.

"It's jes givin' her dad a chance ter 'scape," put in another.

Through it all Lenita stood, calm and brave, within the narrow door, debarring those rough men from entering the cabin.

"Stan' back, gal," roughly spoke the leader, "or I will 'rest yer, too, fur henderin' the law on Roarin' Fork." And he was in the act of laying rough hands upon the girl, when a manly form leaped from his horse's back and rushed between them.

"Any man who lays a hand on that girl, does it at his peril," and the voice of Scott Redleaf rang out on the night air, like a trumpet blast. Every man instinctively fell back as he recognized their superior officer.

"The girl is perfectly innocent; knows nothing of the Coles' gang, if her father does." Then he turned to Lenita, who was softly weeping by his side, and told her to have no fears, that he would protect her with his life if need be. When she was sufficiently calm, she told him that her father was seriously wounded and begged him to do something to relieve him. After Scott had examined Frenchy's wounds, he went to the door with a sad face and said: "Men, you are not needed here. Frenchy is dying. He has received two very bad wounds. Go back where the boys are and help guard the prisoners till I come."

The men rode quietly off up the creek. Scott turned to the bed where Joe Frenchy was breathing his last, his head resting in Lenita's lap. She had been talking to her father, as his last hour drew near, and had controlled herself to listen to his last words, which were:

"Lenita, you've been a good gal. God forgive me fur never makin' you-uns happier, an' fur givin' yer that mean push."

And as the dawn crept mellowly into the dingy little cabin, Joe Frenchy's spirit winged its flight. It was Scott Redleaf's kind hands that led the sorrowing girl away, and prepared the body for its lone resting place on the banks of the Roaring Fork, where its waters forever murmur boisterously on over mossy stones and jagged rocks.

Bert Coles' gang was effectually broken up. Bert was finally captured, but he escaped, and report says he has become a law-abiding citizen in a remote part of Texas.

Lenita was kindly cared for. She was placed in a good mission school, where she is obtaining a useful education. Scott Redleaf is patiently waiting for her to become his wife.

Costumes of the Tyrolese.

The costume of the Tyrolienne is a pretty one, consisting of a stuff dress, with a very full skirt, the bodice cut square in front and filled in with a silk handkerchief which matches in color; and a gay silk apron, which is of pink, blue or yellow, according to the taste of the wearer. The hats are not unlike the sailor hats worn by ladies, except that they have a stiff, straight brim and are generally adorned with tassels of gold bullion. The national costume of the men is even more picturesque, consisting of knitted dark blue or white stockings, knee breeches, waistcoat with two rows of silver buttons, a somewhat long skirtish coat, and a hat with a bunch of some wild bird's feathers at the side. But the prettiest costume of all is that of the jager, or huntsman. The breeches come to the knee only, and the legs are encased in embroidered leather gaiters, leaving the knees bare; the coat is dark green, with collars and cuffs of a lighter shade; a hat of dark green, with an eagle's feather, and an embroidered shot-pouch slung over the shoulder.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

—At a recent ball in New York many guests had no appetite for the game, because imitations of living beasts and birds were also on the table. Underneath a big plate of salmon was a miniature lake of real water, in which goldfish and tadpoles swam about and little frogs disported.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—Boracic acid dissolved in glycerine and frequently applied to the affected parts with a feather is recommended for diphtheria in fowls.

—A million dollars worth of chewing gum is used in the United States every year. Gum one, gum all, seems to be the American motto.—Yonker's Gazette.

—Scientists say that the savage has a more acute sense of smell than civilized people. When two savages get together how they must suffer!—Boston Transcript.

—Recent experiments have demonstrated that an incandescent electric light of 100-candle powder, sunk twenty feet in the ocean, will illuminate the surface sufficiently to distinguish objects within a radius of 250 feet.

—Experiments on the speed of the electric current prove that if a proper conductor could be wound around the globe a signal parting from it at any point of it would return to the starting point in one-half of a second.

—Tannin has hitherto been supposed to be a purely vegetable substance, but it is announced that it has been discovered in the animal kingdom. A French chemist—Mons. Villon—has extracted tannin from corn weevils, which contain about three per cent. of it.

—Pulled wools are largely used in the manufacture of flaunels, and one reason of their being so used is because the process of pulling, either by burning or sweating, destroys the felting properties of the fiber, and so better fits it for use in flannels, which will not so readily shrink in washing.

—Cream of tartar occurs in the juices of many fruit, among them the grape and pineapple; and when the grape juice is being fermented to make wine, a hard crust, known as argo, is formed on the sides of the cask, consisting mainly of acid tartrate of potassium, but also containing tartrate of lime and some coloring matter of the wine.

—The force popularly believed to be exerted by nitro-glycerine and dynamite, when exploded, is somewhat mis-estimated. Thus experiments show that the power developed by the explosion of a ton of dynamite is equal to 45,675 foot-tons; one ton of nitro-glycerine, similarly exploded, will exert a power of 64,452 foot-tons, and one ton of blasting gelatine, similarly exploded, shows a force of 71,050 tons.

—More than $10,000,000 worth of oysters were shipped from Maryland to all parts of the world this season. Over fifty thousand persons are employed in the industry in the State, and it supports besides 1,500 schooners and sloops. To enforce the law for the regulation of these vessels the State maintains an "oyster navy," consisting of five steamers, six schooners, and eight sloops.

—It has long been known that gold is to some extent volatile at high temperature; but it is evidently far more volatile than has hitherto been believed. Mr. Crookes mentioned incidentally at the last meeting of the English Chemical Society that he has found gold to boil violently when heated in the oxyhycrogen flame, and, in fact, to be so volatile that there would seem to be no doubt that it might be distilled in an apparatus similar to that employed by Stas in distilling silver.

—A new theory of the formation of mountains has been offered by Mr. T. Mellard Reade, the well known English geologist. He supposes that the periods of great sedimentary deposit that preceded the birth of every large mountain range have been followed by a great elevation of temperature, producing expansions of the strata, with consequent forcing up of ridges. Laboratory experiments with the various rocks show that heating would give such results.

DICKENS' CHARACTERS.

Why They Are so Deliciously Bewitching to the Average Reader.

Dickens must not only have had exceptional powers of observation and imagination, but extraordinary intensity of sympathy with ordinary feelings and beliefs. His genius in characterization tends to the grotesque and extravagant; his personages, in their names as in their qualities, produce on us the effect of strangeness; the plots of the novels in which they appear would with any other characters seem grossly improbable, and yet his mind is unmistakably rooted in common sense and common humanity. He thus succeeds in giving his readers all the pleasure which comes from contemplating what is strange, odd and eccentric, without disquieting them by any paradoxes in morals or shocking them by any perversions of homely, natural sentiment. The "Christmas Carol," for example, is as wild in grotesque fancy as a dream of Hoffmann, yet in feeling as solid and sweet and humane as a sermon of Channing. It impresses us somewhat as we are impressed by the sight of the Bible as illustrated by Gustave Dore. Thus held fast to common, homely truths and feelings by his sentiments he can safely give reins to his imagination in his creations. The keenest of observers, both of things and persons, all that he observes is still taken up and transformed by his imagination—becomes Dickenized, in fact—so that, whether he describes a landscape, or a bootjack, or a building, or a man, we see the object, not as it is in itself, but as it is deliciously bewitched by his method of looking at it. Every thing is suggested by his outward experience, but modified by his inward experience. The result is that we do not have in him an exact transcript of life, but an individualized ideal of life from his point of view.—E. P. Whipple, in Scribner's Magazine.

WOMEN SHOPKEEPERS.

An Old Maid Prejudice Which is Being Surmounted Rapidly.

The prejudice once entertained against literary ladies has long since been surmounted; the famous passage at arms between George Sand and her mother-in-law is already recalled by most people with amazement; even the most fastidious relations in these days would be proud rather than ashamed of seeing their daughter's or sister's name "on the cover of printed books." But it is otherwise with regard to industrial callings, and the most daring innovation in England at this moment is the lady shopkeeper. At present but few women have had the courage to brave the current social prejudice. We draw such fine distinctions between wholesale and retail traders that our cotton spinners, calico makers and general merchants seem to think they belong to a totally different sphere, from which they look down on the lady who has had sufficient brains, capital and courage to open a shop. That an artist should sell her own paintings in her own studio is proper and becoming, but many people are shocked at the lady who trades in paintings done in other studios. But the Old World moves faster than it did in former days, and before the end of the nineteenth century it is probable a gentlewoman will be recognized in spite of her having entered on commercial pursuits, especially as we are growing accustomed to see scions of our noblest families on our Stock Exchange and in tea merchants' houses; one peer of the realm is now doing an extensive business in coals and another is a cab proprietor.

After speaking of the business success achieved by the Hon. Mrs. Maherley in her London milk-shop and of the reputation and wealth acquired by Miss Charlotte Robinson as a house decorator, Miss Faithfull concludes:

"The more highly educated our women of business are the better for themselves, their work and the whole community. Many of the professions to which ladies have hitherto turned are overcrowded, and when once the fear of losing social position is boldly disregarded, it will be found that commercial life offers a variety of more or less lucrative employment to ladies of birth and capital, who find it more congenial to their tastes and requirements to invest their money and spend their energies in a business which yields a fair return, rather than sit at home content with a scanty pittance and a colorless, monotonous life."—Emily Faithfull.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—"A hen continually gorged with corn will be fat as a hog but lay no eggs," says a poultryman.

—According to the Department of Agriculture, the average per acre of wheat used for seeding is 1.38 bushels.

—When breaking in young colts, put them beside fast walking horses. The first few lessons will make a lasting impression on them.

—An inventive genius has invented a machine which looks as bulky as an old-fashioned stage coach, to rake hay and leave it on the ground in perfect compact cocks.

—Baked Pumpkin: Half a pumpkin with sweet, thick meat, covered with a tin plate, and baked slowly two hours in a brick oven; serve whole in its yellow jacket, and dish hot-baked pumpkin from its rind as wanted.

—When the farmer begins to estimate the value of sheep from the standpoints of meat, fertility and general advantage to the farm, he will not allow the market price of wool to determine whether or not he will raise them.

—Pigs can be most profitably put upon the market when not more than nine months old, at which age they can be made to and should weigh 200 to 300 pounds. To secure the greatest profit, even then the most of this weight should be made in the clover pasture.

—Cream Gingerbrea: One and a half cup nice molasses, one half cup sugar, one cup cream, and the same of buttermilk. Two teaspoons soda, one half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon each of ginger and cinnamon, and sifted flour to make a smooth batter. Bake in quite thick sheets in a moderate oven.

—To grow a horse's mane which parts in the middle and hangs on both sides of his neck, so that it will hang all on one side, braid it in position by little weights tied on the end of the braids. As soon as the mane will hang naturally remove the weights and commence grooming. By this treatment a very obstinate mane can be made to hang beautifully on one side.

—An authority on pigs says that he never thinks of cutting off the tails of his pigs. The tails are the indicators of the porker's condition. If piggy doesn't feel well, if his food doesn't agree with him, his tail begins to straighten. The sicker the pig, the straighter the tail; and the healthier the pig the tighter the curl. The old theory that it takes a bushel of corn to fatten an inch flail this pig raiser scorns. The pig's tail is his pulse; therefore never cut it off.

—Stewed Chops: Broil the chops and let them get cold; then put into a saucepan with two tablespoons of butter and one of minced onion; cover tightly and set in a kettle of cold water; bring slowly to a boil. At the end of an hour add a cup of hot broth (made from the trimmings of chops), seasoned with pepper, salt, a pinch of cloves and chopped parsley; cover again and stew gently until the chops are tender, setting the saucepan directly on the range. Then lay them on a hot dish; strain the gravy, thicken with browned flour, stir in a good teaspoon of currant jelly; boil one minute and pour over the chops.

—One great secret in washing flannels is to beat and shake out all the dust from them before they are put into the clothes basket for the wash. They should be washed in clear, hot soap suds by themselves, then thoroughly rinsed by flopping them about in clean water, shaken and pulled after they have had the water pressed out by the wringer, but not twisted and wrung by the hands. It is not thoroughly rinsing out the soap that hardens flannel; it is washing it with all the dust in that grimes and discolors it. It is wringing that twists and mats the little fibers together, instead of pulling and shaking, which leaves them elastic and springy. The water should not be too hot for the hands to be comfortable, as boiling water is used to full cloth and shrink flannel.

HOW TO TEST SEEDS.

Valuable Suggestions Made at the Ontario Agricultural College.

A bulletin of the Ontario Agricultural College contains among other valuable matter the following to test the vitality of seeds:

1. Place one hundred seeds between sheets of blotting-paper laid on sand, and keep the paper damp in a place where the temperature is about 78 degrees to 85 degrees Fahrenheit. The number of seeds germinating will indicate the percentage good.

2. Place the seeds on a piece of flannel in a saucer, with sufficient water to moisten it thoroughly. After scattering the seeds (one hundred) on the flannel, put a piece of damp blotting-paper over the whole and place in a warm room. Keep it continually damp, and in a short time the seed will germinate; the number sprouting will be the percentage of good seed.

For examining seeds as to purity, scatter them on a piece of black cardboard, and the foreign grains are readily observed. If a good collection of seeds, true to their kind, is kept for comparison, the impurities can be easily identified.

The results of various tests in the germinator are given. The following inferences will practically cover the whole ground:

Age has a marked effect on the vitality of certain seeds.

Many seeds have lost much of their vitality from improper curing or other causes.

Frozen wheat is not reliable for seed, for even though germinating a fair per cent. of growth in the field is of a more or less weakly nature. All seeds should be tested for vitality and purity.

HEAVENLY WONDERS.

How They Have Been Revealed by the Progress in Astronomy.

Looking back to the year 1800 we are astonished at the change. The comparatively simple science of the heavenly bodies known to our predecessors almost perfect, so far as it went, incurious of what lay beyond its grasp, has developed into a body of manifold powers and parts, each with its separate mode and means of growth, full of strong vitality, but animated by a restless and unsatisfied spirit, haunted by the sense of problems unsolved, and tormented by conscious impotence to sound the immensities it perpetually confronts.

Knowledge might then be said to be bounded by the solar system; but even the solar system presented itself under an aspect strangely different from that it now wears. It consisted of the sun, seven planets and twice as many satellites, all circling harmoniously in obedience to a universal law, by the compensating action of which the indefinite stability of their mutual relations was secured. The occasional incursion of a comet or the periodical presence of a single such wanderer, chained by planetary or solar attraction to prevent escape to outer space, availed nothing to impair the symmetry of the majestic spectacle.

Now, not alone have the ascertained limits of the system been widened by 1,000,000,000 of miles, with the addition of one more giant planet and six satellites to the ancient classes of its members, but a complexity has been given to its constitution baffling description or thought. Two hundred and seventy planetary bodies bridge the gap between Jupiter and Mars, the complete investigation of the movements of any one of which would overtask the energies of a life-time. Meteorites, strangers apparently to the fundamental ordering of the solar household, swarm, nevertheless, by millions in every cranny of its space, returning at regular intervals like the comets so singularly associated with them, and sweeping across it with hyperbolic velocities, brought perhaps, from some distant star. And each of these cosmical grains of dust has a theory far more complex than that of Jupiter; it bears within it the secret of its origin, and fulfils a function in the universe. The sun itself is no longer a semi-fabulous, fire-girt globe, but the vast scene of the play of forces as yet imperfectly known to us, offering a boundless field for the most arduous and inspiring researches. Among the planets, the wildest variety in physical habitudes is seen to prevail, and each is recognized as a world apart, inviting inquiries which, to be effective, must necessarily be special and detailed. Even our own moon threatens to break loose from the trammels of calculation and commit errors which sap the very foundation of the lunar theory and suggest the formidable necessity for its revision. Nay, the steadfast earth has forfeited the implicit confidence placed in it as a timekeeper, and questions relating to the stability of the earth's axis and the constancy of the earth's rate of rotation are among those which it behooves the future to answer. Everywhere there is multiformity and change, stimulating a curiosity which the rapid development of methods of research offers the possibility of at least partially gratifying.

Outside the solar system the problems which demand a practical solution are all but infinite in number and extent. And these have all arisen and crowded upon our thoughts in less than one hundred years. For sidereal science became a recognized branch of astronomy only through Herschel's discovery of the revolutions of double stars in 1802. Yet already it may be, and has been called, "the astronomy of the future," so rapidly has the development of a keen and universal interest attended and stimulated the growth of power to investigate this sublime subject. What has been done is little—is scarcely a beginning; yet it is much in comparison with the total blank of a century past. And our knowledge will, we are easily persuaded, appear in turn the merest ignorance to those who come after us. Yet it is not to be despised, since by it we reach up groping fingers to touch the hem of the garment of the Most High.—Sidereal Messenger.

Thoroughbred and Pure Blood.

There is no difference between a thoroughbred and pure-blooded animal, for the first term means of a pure and unmixed breed, stock or race; bred from a sire and dam of the purest or best blood; but the English idea is that the word thoroughbred should only be applied to the thoroughbred race horse, an animal supposed to have descended from the best horses of Spain, Barbary, Turkey and Arabia. Out of such material as was to be obtained from the countries named the English race horse has descended, but is now called a thoroughbred to distinguish it, perhaps, from other equally pure breeds which are not race horses. The name thoroughbred is usually applied to a race of horses, and not to other kinds of domestic animals.—N. Y. Sun.

HOURS OF FARM LABOR.

Why They Can Hardly Be Regulated by Legal Enactments.

In our Northern latitudes the ten-hour or any other fixed limit of the hours of labor can not well be applied to work on the farm. As an employe who had years of experience in farm work well remarked, "If the ten-hour rule is strictly enforced it will be at the disadvantage of the working man." That this is strictly true is evident to any one who, in these short winter days, looks in any country neighborhood to see how long work lasts, how early it is begun, and how early it closes at night. In this season it is doubtful whether active out-of-door work averages much more than nine hours, and is often less. To do this the noon meal must be hurriedly eaten and the breakfast and supper be taken by lamplight. Not long ago we heard of a farmer who regularly, every year, when hiring his help, gave them their choice to work so long as possible in emergencies during the busy season, or to take the ten-hour plan and continue it through the entire year, losing time whenever they did not make the full ten hours. Nearly all the men took the employer's advice to adopt the flexible standard adapted to the farm. Those who stuck for the ten-hour system soon repented of their bargain.

There is a comparatively short season when farm work is excessively hurrying, as in seeding and harvesting. While these jobs are suffering for attention, men and teams may for a little time work much more than ten hours per day without any injury. But even then there are rainy days when little work can be done excepting chores, and these afford time for rest, so that even in the summer the farm laborer does not average much if any more hours of work per day than does the employe in the city workshop. And there is in farm labor a much greater variety of occupation and of thought than is common where the workman's duties are mainly in running machinery. It is this variety that makes farm-life more attractive. Nature is never monotonous. Each successive season brings new duties, and calls forth a different class of faculties in thought as well as in muscle. Even the tension of the busy season has its advantages. It is better that men occasionally test their powers of endurance for a short time, than to plod on in a monotonous round of labor that only partially develops their ability.—American Cultivator.

A Modest, Sensitive Woman

often shrinks from consulting a physician about functional derangement, and prefers to suffer in silence. This may be a mistaken feeling, but it is one which is largely prevalent. To all such women we would say that one of the most skillful physicians of the day, who has had a vast experience in curing diseases peculiar to women, has prepared a remedy which is of inestimable aid to them. We refer to Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. This is the only remedy for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case or money refunded. See guarantee printed on bottle wrapper.

Prepare for Spring

It is none too early to be getting ready for spring, and the first thing which should receive attention is your own system. If you have not been well during the winter, have been troubled with scrofula, salt rheum, or other humors of the blood, you should purify the blood by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. You will then escape that indescribable tired feeling which is so prostrating and often so unaccountable in the spring months. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla before it is too late.

"I take Hood's Sarsaparilla for a spring medicine, and I find it just the thing. It tones up my system and makes me feel like a different man. My wife takes it for dyspepsia, and she derives great benefit from it." FRANK C. TURNER, Hook & Ladder No. 1, Friend Street, Boston.

Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC,

THE

Great Spring Medicine.

THE BEST REMEDY FOR THE NERVES.

For nervous and physical exhaustion, weak, tired and languid feelings, with no power or ambition for exertion, it is the very best remedy to find an use by certain cure. In cases of sleeplessness, wakefulness and nervous irritability its use will be followed by calm repose and natural, refreshing sleep. For nervousness, nervous debility, despondency and depression of the mind it is a perfect specific, and its effects wonderful. For neuralgia, rheumatism, paralysis, numbness, trembling and insanity, it is the only recognized sure cure. It never fails to cure nervous and sick headache, palpitation of the heart, apoplexy, epileptic fits, hysteria, St. Vitus's Dance.

THE BEST SPRING TONIC FOR THE BLOOD.

In the spring the blood requires a remedy which is cleansing, purifying, and at the same time strengthening and invigorating. Not only the sick, but those who call themselves well, should keep well by not neglecting this important duty. A few bottles of DR. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC, which is purely vegetable, will remove the languid, listless and weakened feelings due to spring, and restore the vitality, vigor and energies.

THE BEST STOMACH AND LIVER MEDICINE.

DR. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC has no equal in the cure of dyspepsia, indigestion, loss of appetite, bad taste in the mouth mornings, constipation, biliousness, torpid liver, belching of wind, fullness and distress at pit of stomach, pain in side and under shoulder, headache and dizziness. In the spring all the organs become torpid and inactive, and require the gentle yet positive effects of this wonderful remedy to correct their condition and establish natural action.

THE BEST KIDNEY REMEDY.

The kidneys act as drains to carry the worn-out and poisonous substances from the system, and kidney complaints always injure the general health because these worn-out substances are retained in the body. For all kidney troubles, weakness and pain in the back, and diseases of the urinary organs, there is no medicine in the world which gives so certain and speedy a cure as DR. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC.

Pronounced by the Newspapers, Ministers, Doctors, Lawyers and the people everywhere as the

PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Is More Positive.

NEW YORK, Feb. 26.—To-day's World prints a three-column interview with Mr. Blaine, which has been cabled from Florence by Mr. T. C. Crawford, for some time the World's correspondent at Washington, now in Europe. Mr. Blaine, in the course of a long conversation, distinctly asserted that under no circumstances would he allow his name to be used in connection with the next Presidential nomination. He insists on the sincerity of his withdrawal, and asserts that he had made up his mind thereto long ago. He considers, first, that any man whose name has been associated with a defeat in a Presidential campaign owes it to his party not to allow himself to be renominated, and, secondly, he is unequal to facing the fatigues, worry and excitement of another canvass, all the more as he would feel himself bound to work as hard as on previous occasions.

Mrs. Blaine and the other members of his family are most emphatic in their approval of his withdrawal, which is neither hasty nor recent in its decision. Mr. Blaine will not return from Europe until June, and not until after the Republican Convention. He declines to express himself on the subject of the Republican candidates now in the field, but asserts that he did not retire in favor of any particular one of them. He is convinced of a Republican victory, basing his conviction in particular on the tariff question. When Mr. Blaine was asked the direct question, whether he would, under any circumstances, permit his name to be used again as a candidate, he replied in the most emphatic negative, but then added:

"I do not wish to make any new affirmations upon the subject. I have said all that I wish to say on the subject in that letter, That letter, as you must know, was not a haphazard, off-hand affair. It was the result of much deliberation and careful thought. You will remember that I told you in Paris last December that I had no intention of being a candidate again, and that I had practically made up my mind at that time to forbid the use of my name in the approaching convention."

"I hold," he said later in the conversation, "that I have no right to be a candidate again. A man who has once been the candidate of his party and defeated owes it to his party to withdraw and not be a candidate a second time. More than this, there is another plain reason for my withdrawal. I could not go through the burden and fatigue of another Presidential canvass—such a one as the canvass of the last campaign. To accept a nomination, and to do less than before, would be impossible."

Mr. Crawford thus concludes his dispatch: "Toward the close of my last call I asked Mr. Blaine when he expected to return to America. He said that he expected to reach New York about the last of June. He expects to spend the late spring in London. He has not yet determined upon his movements. After leaving Florence he will probably go straight to England from Italy. He said, with an air of frankness not to be mistaken:

"'You have no idea what a relief it is to me to think that I am now out of the canvass, and that when I come back to New York in the summer that I shall not be going back there to face reception after reception and to enter into the turmoil and excitement of a political canvass, I can now come back quietly, after the convention has once decided its result, and enjoy my own life in my own way, free, I hope, from further criticism or comment.'"

A novel and very successful method of raising funds is practiced in the negro Sunday schools at Hayneville, Ala. The scholars were told that if they couldn't bring a nickel they might bring an egg or two instead. The next week that Sunday School bore a striking resemblance to an incubating establishment, and farmers for forty miles around began to complain of the scarcity of eggs.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27th, 1888.—General Sheridan, who usually refuses to talk politics, says that James G. Blaine will be the next President of the United States.

The more the Fisheries treaty is studied the more its weak points protrude. It is not believed here that the Senate will ever consent to ratify it. Nor should they. We are entitled to much more than the proposed treaty gives us and the citizens of the country look to the republican Senate to protect their interests.

The Pension Committee of the House have reported favorably the bill pensioning Union ex-prisoners of the war who were confined sixty days or more in Confederate prisons and are suffering from disabilities which may reasonably be traced to their imprisonment. The pension is to be at the rates now provided by law for like disability. The bill further grants a compensation of $2 per day to ex-prisoners of the war for each day that they were confined in prison. The bill increasing the pension for total deafness to $30 per month has also been favorably reported.

One of the finest floral tributes ever seen at the Capitol was on Senator Manderson's desk last Friday as he made his speech in favor of the Dependent (G. A. R.) pension bill. It was presented by ex-Union soldiers as a slight testimonial of their appreciation of his untiring efforts in behalf of their bill. By the way, this bill is almost sure to become a law. It will pass both houses and it is not believed that Cleveland will dare to veto it.

To-day week the Democrats of the House will commit another political theft by retaining Mr. Davidson, of Alabama, in the seat to which Mr. McDuffie was duly elected.

Society is all agog over the rumor that Mrs. Folsom, Cleveland's mother-in-law, who is now in Paris, has gone there to obtain her trouseau for her approaching marriage to Secretary Bayard.

The House Judicary Committee has reported favorably a bill rendering elegible to any position in the United States Army any person who has served in the military, naval or civil service of the late Confederate States. If the bill should pass both Houses Cleveland, can, should he see fit, appoint Jeff Davis to the next position that becomes vacant in the Army. But it isn't likely to pass.

The Administration circus arrived home safely yesterday morning. Ringmaster Lamont reports large attendance and enthusiastic receptions for the prize clown and his Garden of Eden jokes.

The Union ex-prisoners of War Association held their second annual re-union in this city Thursday night. They had quite a jolly time singing war songs and recalling incidents of their sufferings in Southern prisons. Among the speakers were Representatives Morrill and Holmes, both of whom favored giving a pension to every soldier who wore the blue, whether disabled or not. They urged the members of the association to get the legislatures of their States to memorialize Congress in behalf of such a measure.

Postmaster-General Dickinson is said to be very ill. He overworked himself last week in helping to win the Cleveland victory in the National Committee. Besides he is run to death by people who want him to discharge trained employes to make places for political strikers. This policy has already been carried so far in this Department that a protracted howl has been raised from the people irrespective of politics.

Cleveland had a hard fight to carry his point of having the Democratic Nominating Convention held before the Republican Convention. The anti-Cleveland men under the lead of Senator Gorman stole a march on the Cleveland people at the first day's session of the National Committee and rushed through a resolution fixing July 3d as the date. But the next day the Cleveland men rallied and with the assistance of numerous telegrams from Dan. Lamont who was with Cleveland in Florida, succeeded in getting a re-consideration and having June 5th made the date and St. Louis the place. The fight made shows very plainly that Cleveland is not to get the nomination without a struggle. Hill has many friends and they say from this time he is to be actively pushed forward.

The Oklahoma Territory bill was considered by the House, in committee of the whole on Saturday but no vote taken.

Senator Sherman advocates the Senate bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Co., of Nicaragua, and says he would be willing even that the United States Government should construct the canal. He is not alone in his willingness. There are many people who believe it would be good policy for the United States to construct a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, over the route proposed by the Nicaragua company or any route possible.

Another Canal Bill.

ANNAPOLIS, Feb. 29.—The committee on internal improvements, through Dr. Wootton, reported tonight a canal bill. It is entitled 'An act to direct the attorney general to institute appropriate legal proceedings to obtain a decree or decrees for the sale of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal under the mortgages held thereon by this State, and to impose certain obligations and confer certain powers upon the purchaser." The bill provides that the attorney general be directed to institute such legal proceedings as he shall deem appropriate in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and in the Circuit Court of any one of the counties of this State in which the Chesapeake and Ohio canal is located, in the name of the State of Maryland as plaintiff, against all parties properly entitled to be made defendants in said cause, to procure a decree or decress for the sale of the canal, its works and property, franchises and property rights under the revenue, mortgages and liens heretofore executed by the canal company in favor of this State, and upon which said company has long made default. That if the canal company shall during 1888 and 1889 earn money enough to enable it to keep the canal and its works throughout its entire length in good condition for navigation, pay the saleries to its employes and all its expenses and also the accruing coupons on the repair bonds, amounting to $500,000, no sale shall take place earlier than January 1, 1890, or any subsequent year, but if during 1890, or any subsequent year, the canal company shall fail to earn money sufficient to meet all requirements, the sale shall take place in the year next succeeding. The sale however, will not be ratified or a clear title given until the sale is confirmed by the General Assembly at its first session thereafter. The purchase price may be paid in cash or on such terms as the courts heretofore mentioned in which the legal proceedings authorized are pending may direct, if the purchaser is authorized to operate the canal, either as a waterway or by constructing a railroad over and upon the tow path or bed of the canal, and to make such use as may be practicable of the water power. The purchaser is also authorized to construct a railroad by complying with the State railroad laws.

The Business View.

NEW YORK, Feb. 24.—Following is R. G. Dun & Co.'s review of trade for the week ended Saturday, February 26:

Both legitimate trade and speculation continues duller than is usual at this season, though moderate improvement in trade is noticed at Memphis, Charleston, Kansas City and Milwaukee, and in speculation there has been a little more activity in stocks. To natural causes of dullness at this season there is added quite unusual uncertainty in several important branches of business. The termination of the Reading strike has come at last, and, as was suggested some time ago, it only increases the uncertainty in the coal business. Efforts to settle railroad wars have not succeeded, but new cuts cause much disturbance.

The sugar trust meets unexpected opposition, threatening its existence; operations of other syndicates or combinations make it impossible to foresee the future in many trades; and meanwhile the uncertainty as to Congressional action on the tariff is in no degree lessened.

Within a few days the sharp rise in foreign exchange has also rendered the future of the money market less clear.

The fact that the Reading strike but slightly affected the iron business became clear before work was resumed, and it is now felt that, with the known shrinkage in the demand for iron, the resumption of work by a few furnaces would be likely to insure lower prices. A sale of extra good forge for $15.85 at the furnace is reported, and the competition to secure orders for rails is still keen. Bar iron is quoted at $1.90, but car building continues unusually large; the Pennsylvania Company alone has placed orders for 2,200 cars and 70 locomotives. Eastern nail makers are combined, and the price stiffens a little. Coke producers at Connellsville have at last consented to reduce the price 25 cents, which will help manufacturers. The Gogebic mine consolidation has collapsed and the orders for lake ore thus far indicate a heavy decrease in demand.

The failure of Graff, Bennett & Co., of Pittsburgh, produces no disturbance, but illustrates the over-confidence of the last year's expansion.

The moderate improvement in the stock market is interesting, but as yet has scarcely lifted prices above the level of February 1st. Of the new bonds issued this year, $54,000,000 are for new roads, and nearly $12,000,000 were listed last week, but how many of these have found purchasers, no one knows.

The quick advance in foreign exchange appears to indicate that investments of foreign capital on this side have ceased for the present and experienced bankers now discuss the possibility of early exports of gold. The actual exports of goods at New York for three weeks past, show an increase of 35 per cent over the same weeks of last year, but no such increase is expected in the aggregate.

The treasury has taken in $3,100,000 more than it has paid out during the week slightly diminishing bank deposits.

The situation at Washington does not promise any early action in regard to the surplus and even the bill authorizing purchases of bonds may be delayed.

Domestic exchanges are but slightly in favor of New York, and the movement of money this way seems to have ceased with one tendency to outgo in the direction of Boston. At interior points the supply of money is everywhere reported ample, and collections are on the whole improving, espeeially in the Northwest.

Trade in breadstuffs is hindered by foreign uncertainties, which keep alive hopes of war and higher prices. Corn and oats have declined about one cent each, while wheat has risen as much but is weak again. No change is noted in hog products. Oil has risen about two cents, while cotton has weakened. Sales abroad and the lack of domestic demand weakens coffee, and in the sugar trade a Philadelphia house offers to undersell the trust, and at Boston there is a rumor of a split, while from San Francisco news comes of organized opposition by Spreckles and others.

The dry goods market continues fairly active for cotton, though print cloths are a shade easier. In the jobbing trade growing activity is noticed. In woolens the prospect of improvement is disturbed by the renewal of the large auction sales and a peremptory sale of silks is announced.

Why it Opposes Cleveland.

Birmingham Age, Democrat.

Yes, the Age trying to beat Cleveland. Why? Because Cleveland will beat the Democratic party just as certain as he is nominated. He has deserted the platform upon which he was nominated, and elected—by the skin of his teeth. He has gone back upon the speeches he made in New Jersey when he foresaw that unless he stood squarely upon that platform he would be defeated. What was that platform other than a protection platform? What meant Mr. Cleveland's visit to the protection State of New Jersey except to proclaim to the people of that State that he meant to stand or fall by that platform?

How does the matter stand now? He has deserted that platform. He has utterly ignored it. In what respect? That platform says, "In making a reduction in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries." Will any sane man say that the putting of raw materials on the free list, such as wool, cool, iron ore, etc., will not injure these industries?

Again, Mr. Cleveland has put himself on record in opposition to any repeal of any part of the internal revenue system, which the platform expressly declares to be a "war tax." And he insists that, in time of peace, when he knows the government has no earthly use for this tax, it shall be collected just as if the government was engaged in war and was compelled to raise a revenue by this system of direct taxation.

The Age does not care a snap about the reputation it may make by its opposition to Cleveland. It is working for the good of the country, and what it believes to be for the good of he party.

The Great Strike Begun.

CHICAGO, Feb. 27.—A few minutes before 4 o'clock this morning the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy yards at Canal and 16th streets presented the usual appearance. The early morning mail had left on time, and the switch engines were at work. One engineer took a switch train to the Chicago and Atlantic junction shortly before 3 o'clock. He said he had heard nothing of an order to strike and that he would certainly take his train to the junction and run the engine back to the round house. Other engineers of switch engines also said they had not been ordered to strike. At 3:30 o'clock there was the usual movement of cars at the freight and switching stations at 19th street and Western avenue, where cars for the East and the stock yards are handled. Just before the time appointed for the strike Trainmaster S. T. Pope issued an order that no trains should be moved west of Chicago. This was taken by the few trainmen in the yards as a confession that the company had secured no men worth mentioning, and that the road would in a moment more be practically tied up. At 4 o'clock precisely switch engine No. 487 went into the Western avenue round house. Three others soon followed it, and the engineers and firemen quit work. The strike was on in earnest.

The strike promises to be the most remarkable ever known, for in it the strongest single labor organization in existence has been pitted against the largest railroad corporation in the West and one of the greatest in mileage and wealth in the world. Should the strike long continue, it is probable that in addition to the 1,400 men directly involved, the great majority of 14,000 employees of the company will be thrown out of work, the 25,000 members of the engineers' brotherhood throughout the country called upon to contribute of their savings, and the industries of a vast section of country tributary to the road subject to a partial paralysis. The far-reaching effects of the strike can be inferred from the fact that the road has 6,000 miles of main and leased lines grid-ironing the States of Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, and Nebraska. From Chicago it reaches to Denver, over 1,000 miles away, and Cheyenne, Wyoming, equally as far. Minneapolis to the north and St. Louis to the south are also within its reach.

AURORA, Feb. 27, 4 A. M.—The shut-down on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road is complete. All operations ceased even before the hour set for the strike. Several trains came in just previous to 4 o'clock, and as they arrived in the yards one by one, each was quietly abandoned by the trainmen. The early mail train from Chicago had gone through on time, and when the appointed moment came for the strike nothing was stirring, and the company's premises were as silent as a cemetery and looked lonely and desolate in the dull gray morning light.

Horrible Story From China.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 25.—The Chinese mail, which arrived to-day, brings the details of a remarkable tragedy in a Buddhist Monastery at Roundridge, near Canton. A number of monks and nuns appeared to take the vows of the order recently, and among the applicants were two unusually beautiful young women. Their physical charms proved too much for two of the monks, who, when the others had gone from the Temple, made a desperate assault on the young women. Their screams the others to the rescue. The abbot decided to turn the monks over to the Civil Magistrate, but the latter sent them back to the monastery for trial and punishment. Each offender received twenty lashes on the bare back in the presence of all the others. This punishment so enraged the culprits that when released they armed themselves with knives and attacked the abbot when they were bound and this time it was determined to make the punishment severe. It was resolved to burn the offenders to death in the cremating house of the monastery, that the purifying influences of fire might first cleanse their hearts. Then it was hoped that even on their behalf the saving power of Buddha might be exerted. On the 17th of January the sentence was carried out. The two priests were carried bound into the cremating-house, and in the presence of the brethren and a large crowd of spectators from the village they were burned to death.

W. W. Corcoran Dead.

WASHINGTON, D. C. Feb. 24.—W. W. Corcoran died at 6:30 this morning.

Mr. Corcoran was a very old man, having been born at Georgetown, D. C., December 27, 1789. Mr. Corcoran spent his whole life in the District of Columbia, where his father settled shortly after the Revolutionary war, and there he was educated and engaged in trade. In 1840 he formed a partnership in Washington with Mr. G. W. Riggs. Henceforward his prosperity was continuous.

His financial services to the Government at the time of the Mexican war, called out the thanks of Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State. No visitor to the National capital has failed to visit the Corcoran Art Gallery, at Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventeenth street, over the door of which is the simple inscription "Dedicated to Art." This is a fine building filled with rich treasures of vast artistic and money value. The erection of the gallery was begun in 1857, but in the war time it was occupied by the Quartermaster's Department. The total cost was about $350,000.

Another and most touching expression of Mr. Corcoran's philanthropy, was the founding of the Louise Home for the sustenance of aged women, left without means. The Home is named after Mr. Corcoran's only daughter, Louise, long since dead, whose memory he tenderly cherished.

Another instance of Mr. Corcoran's public spirit and liberality was his providing for the re-interment of the author of "Home, Sweet Home," and the erection of a monument over his grave.

In 1835 Mr. Corcoran married Miss Louise Morris, daughter of Commodre Morris, one of the heroes of the war of 1812, but enjoyed only five years of wedded life. Mrs. Corcoran died, leaving a son who soon followed her to the grave, and a daughter, Louise, who, as she grew up, developed the loviest traits of character, and was remarkable for her sympathy and charities to the poor and needy. Mr. Corcoran never married again.

Mr. Corcoran was said to have personally known all the Presidents of the United States except Washington, and was the intimate friend of all since Madison.

Policy of Protection.'

The policy of protection is founded upon the idea that it is best for us as a nation to produce, by American labor, as many of the articles essential to human life and comfort as possible; that to encourage their production we are justified in levying upon foreign articles that come into competition with ours such reasonable rates of duty as will induce capital to embark in such industries and secure to American workingmen reasonable wages consistent with the higher wants and the better food, clothing and shelter demanded by American workingmen. The object of all this is to secure the greatest diversity of employments by the substitution of American products for foreign products. When this policy was first adopted there were practically no manufactures in America, and the principal object was to develop the simpler and ruder forms of manufacture and the raw materials of industry. Now, our manufactures have grown to such a marvelous degree that they amounted in 1880, according to the census, to $5,400,000,000, and according to an estimate made three years ago to over six thousand millions, and now to near seven thousand millions.—John Sherman.

Is the Young Woman Insane?

For months I have been in possession of facts concerning the alarming mental condition of a young lady residing on —— street, in ——, who was once the pride of her parents and delight of her friends, yet who has recently become so changed as to cause great anxiety to her relativee and gossip among the neighbors, and the case being one of great singularity now demands publicity.

Her father says he first noticed her idiosyncrasy last January, one morning at the breakfast table, when she not only acted as if in a State of great happiness, but said, "If you please," and "Thank you," as she asked for food and was served. A day or two later her mother found her in her room darning stockings, instead of reading novels, and she also appeared in the kitchen a day or two later, and insisted on helping her parent in the labor of baking and making pastry and bread.

A physician was at once called in, who, unknown to the patient, watched her through a keyhole for an hour while she was engaged in repairing her little brother's torn trousers, and sewing buttons on her father's shirts. The doctor said he had practiced 25 years, and never during his entire medical practice had he seen any young unmarried female manifest such symptoms as those witnessed. Her appetite, however, seemed to increase rather than diminish, and a rosy flush was observable on her cheeks which had not been seen before. But the most singular symp- was developed a few days since, when her father, hoping to draw her from her new ideas placed two hundred dollars in her hands with the remark:

"There, Nannie, rig yourself out in a nice new dress."

She immediately replied: "I do not need a new dress now, and if you will let me keep twenty-five dollars of this to pay old Mrs. McFlannigaaety's rent—her husband has just died, you know—I had much rather you would take the rest of the money and apply it to that new property you have purchased."

The old man looked at her for a few minutes, and then fell upon the floor in anguish, saying between his sobs, "Her mind is goue! Her mind is gone!"

I called to see her yesterday and found her building a nice pudding and putting a mansard roof of frostwork on a fruit cake. But there was a look in her eyes that told too plainly that she would not long be seen in her elegant home. A solitaire ring on her forefinger told the near approach of the winged and youthful destroyer who shoots his victims with arrows; and, as I left the premises, a young man bounded up the steps with the air of one who knows the affair will soon be over, She will pass away some morning in June. SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1888.

Is More Positive.

NEW YORK, Feb. 26.—To-day's World prints a three-column interview with Mr. Blaine, which has been cabled from Florence by Mr. T. C. Crawford, for some time the World's correspondent at Washington, now in Europe. Mr. Blaine, in the course of a long conversation, distinctly asserted that under no circumstances would he allow his name to be used in connection with the next Presidential nomination. He insists on the sincerity of his withdrawal, and asserts that he had made up his mind thereto long ago. He considers, first, that any man whose name has been associated with a defeat in a Presidential campaign owes it to his party not to allow himself to be renominated, and, secondly, he is unequal to facing the fatigues, worry and excitement of another canvass, all the more as he would feel himself bound to work as hard as on previous occasions.

Mrs. Blaine and the other members of his family are most emphatic in their approval of his withdrawal, which is neither hasty nor recent in its decision. Mr. Blaine will not return from Europe until June, and not until after the Republican Convention. He declines to express himself on the subject of the Republican candidates now in the field, but asserts that he did not retire in favor of any particular one of them. He is convinced of a Republican victory, basing his conviction in particular on the tariff question. When Mr. Blaine was asked the direct question, whether he would, under any circumstances, permit his name to be used again as a candidate, he replied in the most emphatic negative, but then added:

"I do not wish to make any new affirmations upon the subject. I have said all that I wish to say on the subject in that letter, That letter, as you must know, was not a haphazard, off-hand affair. It was the result of much deliberation and careful thought. You will remember that I told you in Paris last December that I had no intention of being a candidate again, and that I had practically made up my mind at that time to forbid the use of my name in the approaching convention."

"I hold," he said later in the conversation, "that I have no right to be a candidate again. A man who has once been the candidate of his party and defeated owes it to his party to withdraw and not be a candidate a second time. More than this, there is another plain reason for my withdrawal. I could not go through the burden and fatigue of another Presidential canvass—such a one as the canvass of the last campaign. To accept a nomination, and to do less than before, would be impossible."

Mr. Crawford thus concludes his dispatch: "Toward the close of my last call I asked Mr. Blaine when he expected to return to America. He said that he expected to reach New York about the last of June. He expects to spend the late spring in London. He has not yet determined upon his movements. After leaving Florence he will probably go straight to England from Italy. He said, with an air of frankness not to be mistaken:

"'You have no idea what a relief it is to me to think that I am now out of the canvass, and that when I come back to New York in the summer that I shall not be going back there to face reception after reception and to enter into the turmoil and excitement of a political canvass, I can now come back quietly, after the convention has once decided its result, and enjoy my own life in my own way, free, I hope, from further criticism or comment.'"

A novel and very successful method of raising funds is practiced in the negro Sunday schools at Hayneville, Ala. The scholars were told that if they couldn't bring a nickel they might bring an egg or two instead. The next week that Sunday School bore a striking resemblance to an incubating establishment, and farmers for forty miles around began to complain of the scarcity of eggs.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27th, 1888.—General Sheridan, who usually refuses to talk politics, says that James G. Blaine will be the next President of the United States.

The more the Fisheries treaty is studied the more its weak points protrude. It is not believed here that the Senate will ever consent to ratify it. Nor should they. We are entitled to much more than the proposed treaty gives us and the citizens of the country look to the republican Senate to protect their interests.

The Pension Committee of the House have reported favorably the bill pensioning Union ex-prisoners of the war who were confined sixty days or more in Confederate prisons and are suffering from disabilities which may reasonably be traced to their imprisonment. The pension is to be at the rates now provided by law for like disability. The bill further grants a compensation of $2 per day to ex-prisoners of the war for each day that they were confined in prison. The bill increasing the pension for total deafness to $30 per month has also been favorably reported.

One of the finest floral tributes ever seen at the Capitol was on Senator Manderson's desk last Friday as he made his speech in favor of the Dependent (G. A. R.) pension bill. It was presented by ex-Union soldiers as a slight testimonial of their appreciation of his untiring efforts in behalf of their bill. By the way, this bill is almost sure to become a law. It will pass both houses and it is not believed that Cleveland will dare to veto it.

To-day week the Democrats of the House will commit another political theft by retaining Mr. Davidson, of Alabama, in the seat to which Mr. McDuffie was duly elected.

Society is all agog over the rumor that Mrs. Folsom, Cleveland's mother-in-law, who is now in Paris, has gone there to obtain her trouseau for her approaching marriage to Secretary Bayard.

The House Judicary Committee has reported favorably a bill rendering elegible to any position in the United States Army any person who has served in the military, naval or civil service of the late Confederate States. If the bill should pass both Houses Cleveland, can, should he see fit, appoint Jeff Davis to the next position that becomes vacant in the Army. But it isn't likely to pass.

The Administration circus arrived home safely yesterday morning. Ringmaster Lamont reports large attendance and enthusiastic receptions for the prize clown and his Garden of Eden jokes.

The Union ex-prisoners of War Association held their second annual re-union in this city Thursday night. They had quite a jolly time singing war songs and recalling incidents of their sufferings in Southern prisons. Among the speakers were Representatives Morrill and Holmes, both of whom favored giving a pension to every soldier who wore the blue, whether disabled or not. They urged the members of the association to get the legislatures of their States to memorialize Congress in behalf of such a measure.

Postmaster-General Dickinson is said to be very ill. He overworked himself last week in helping to win the Cleveland victory in the National Committee. Besides he is run to death by people who want him to discharge trained employes to make places for political strikers. This policy has already been carried so far in this Department that a protracted howl has been raised from the people irrespective of politics.

Cleveland had a hard fight to carry his point of having the Democratic Nominating Convention held before the Republican Convention. The anti-Cleveland men under the lead of Senator Gorman stole a march on the Cleveland people at the first day's session of the National Committee and rushed through a resolution fixing July 3d as the date. But the next day the Cleveland men rallied and with the assistance of numerous telegrams from Dan, Lamont who was with Cleveland in Florida, succeeded in getting a re-consideration and having June 5th made the date and St. Louis the place. The fight made shows very plainly that Cleveland is not to get the nomination without a struggle. Hill has many friends and they say from this time he is to be actively pushed forward.

The Oklahoma Territory bill was considered by the House, in committee of the whole on Saturday but no vote taken.

Senator Sherman advocates the Senate bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Co., of Nicaragua, and says he would be willing even that the United States Government should construct the canal. He is not alone in his willingness. There are many people who believe it would be good policy for the United States to construct a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, over the route proposed by the Nicaragua company or any route possible.

Another Canal Bill.

ANNAPOLIS, Feb. 29.—The committee on internal improvements, through Dr. Wootton, reported tonight a canal bill. It is entitled 'An act to direct the attorney general to institute appropriate legal proceedings to obtain a decree or decrees for the sale of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal under the mortgages held thereon by this State, and to impose certain obligations and confer certain powers upon the purchaser." The bill provides that the attorney general be directed to institute such legal proceedings as he shall deem appropriate in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and in the Circuit Court of any one of the counties of this State in which the Chesapeake and Ohio canal is located, in the name of the State of Maryland as plaintiff, against all parties properly entitled to be made defendants in said cause, to procure a decree or decress for the sale of the canal, its works and property, franchises and property rights under the revenue, mortgages and liens heretofore executed by the canal company in favor of this State, and upon which said company has long made default. That if the canal company shall during 1888 and 1889 earn money enough to enable it to keep the canal and its works throughout its entire length in good condition for navigation, pay the saleries to its employes and all its expenses and also the accruing coupons on the repair bonds, amounting to $500,000, no sale shall take place earlier than January 1, 1890, or any subsequent year, but if during 1890, or any subsequent year, the canal company shall fail to earn money sufficient to meet all reqnirements, the sale shall take place in the year next succeeding. The sale however, will not be ratified or a clear title given until the sale is confirmed by the General Assembly at its first session thereafter. The purchase price may be paid in cash or on such terms as the courts heretofore mentioned in which the legal proceedings authorized are pending may direct, if the purchaser is authorized to operate the canal, either as a waterway or by constructing a railroad over and upon the tow path or bed of the canal, and to make such use as may be practicable of the water power. The purchaser is also authorized to construct a railroad by complying with the State railroad laws.

The Business View.

The abbot decided to turn the monks over to the Civil Magistrate, but the latter sent them back to the monastery for trial and punishment. Each offender received twenty lashes on the bare back in the presence of all the others. This punishment so enraged the culprits that when released they armed themselves with knives and attacked the abbot when they were bound and this time it was determined to make the punishment severe. It was resolved to burn the offenders to death in the cremating house of the monastery, that the purifying influences of fire might first cleanse their hearts. Then it was hoped that even on their behalf the saving power of Buddha might be exerted. On the 17th of January the sentence was carried out. The two priests were carried bound into the cremating-house, and in the presence of the brethren and a large crowd of spectators from the village they were burned to death.

W. W. Corcoran Dead.

WASHINGTON, D. C. Feb. 24.—W. W. Corcoran died at 6:30 this morning.

Mr. Corcoran was a very old man, having been born at Georgetown, D. C., December 27, 1789. Mr. Corcoran spent his whole life in the District of Columbia, where his father settled shortly after the Revolutionary war, and there he was educated and engaged in trade. In 1840 he formed a partnership in Washington with Mr. G. W. Riggs. Henceforward his prosperity was continuous.

His financial services to the Government at the time of the Mexican war, called out the thanks of Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State. No visitor to the National capital has failed to visit the Corcoran Art Gallery, at Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventeenth street, over the door of which is the simple inscription "Dedicated to Art." This is a fine building filled with rich treasures of vast artistic and money value. The erection of the gallery was begun in 1857, but in the war time it was occupied by the Quartermaster's Department. The total cost was about $350,000.

Another and most touching expression of Mr. Corcoran's philanthropy, was the founding of the Louise Home for the sustenance of aged women, left without means. The Home is named after Mr. Corcoran's only daughter, Louise, long since dead, whose memory he tenderly cherished.

Another instance of Mr. Corcoran's public spirit and liberality was his providing for the re-interment of the author of "Home, Sweet Home," and the erection of a monument over his grave.

In 1835 Mr. Corcoran married Miss Louise Morris, daughter of Commodre Morris, one of the heroes of the war of 1812, but enjoyed only five years of wedded life. Mrs. Corcoran died, leaving a son who soon followed her to the grave, and a daughter, Louise, who, as she grew up, developed the loviest traits of character, and was remarkable for her sympathy and charities to the poor and needy. Mr. Corcoran never married again.

Mr. Corcoran was said to have personally known all the Presidents of the United States except Washington, and was the intimate friend of all since Madison.

Policy of Protection.'

The policy of protection is founded upon the idea that it is best for us as a nation to produce, by American labor, as many of the articles essential to human life and comfort as possible; that to encourage their production we are justified in levying upon foreign articles that come into competition with ours such reasonable rates of duty as will induce capital to embark in such industries and secure to American workingmen reasonable wages consistent with the higher wants and the better food, clothing and shelter demanded by American workingmen. The object of all this is to secure the greatest diversity of employments by the substitution of American products for foreign products. When this policy was first adopted there were practically no manufactures in America, and the principal object was to develop the simpler and ruder forms of manufacture and the raw materials of industry. Now, our manufactures have grown to such a marvelous degree that they amounted in 1880, according to the census, to $5,400,000,000, and according to an estimate made three years ago to over six thousand millions, and now to near seven thousand millions.—John Sherman.

Is the Young Woman Insane?

For months I have been in possession of facts concerning the alarming mental condition of a young lady residing on ——— street, in ———, who was once the pride of her parents and delight of her friends, yet who has recently become so changed as to cause great anxiety to her relatives and gossip among the neighbors, and the case being one of great singularity now demands publicity.

Her father says he first noticed her idiosyncrasy last January, one morning at the breakfast table, when she not only acted as if in a State of great happiness, but said, "If you please," and "Thank you," as she asked for food and was served. A day or two later her mother found her in her room darning stockings, instead of reading novels, and she also appeared in the kitchen a day or two later, and insisted on helping her parent in the labor of baking and making pastry and bread.

A physician was at once called in, who, unknown to the patient, watched her through a keyhole for an hour while she was engaged in repairing her little brother's torn trousers, and sewing buttons on her father's shirts. The doctor said he had practiced 25 years, and never during his entire medical practice had he seen any young unmarried female manifest such symptoms as those witnessed. Her appetite, however, seemed to increase rather than diminish, and a rosy flush was observable on her cheeks which had not been seen before. But the most singular symp was developed a few days since, when her father, hoping to draw her from her new ideas placed two hundred dollars in her hands with the remark:

"There, Nannie, rig yourself out in a nice new dress."

She immediately replied: "I do not need a new dress now, and if you will let me keep twenty-five dollars of this to pay old Mrs. McFlannigaety's rent—her husband has just died, you know—I had much rather you would take the rest of the money and apply it to that new property you have purchased."

The old man looked at her for a few minutes, and then fell upon the floor in anguish, saying between his sobs, "Her mind is gone! Her mind is gone!"

I called to see her yesterday and found her building a nice pudding and putting a mansard roof of frostwork on a fruit cake. But there was a look in her eyes that told too plainly that she would not long be seen in her elegant home. A solitaire ring on her forefinger told the near approach of the winged and youthful destroyer who shoots his victims with arrows; and, as I left the premises, a young man bounded up the steps with the air of one who knows the affair will soon be over, She will pass away some morning in June. No cards.

Legislative Notes.

Senator Browning and Mr. Peddicord came up Saturday morning and returned to Annapolis Monday.

There has been but little legislation affecting this county for the past two weeks, and nothing of special moment.

A bill to incorporate the Garrett Bank, at Oakland, was introduced by Mr. Browning Tuesday.

New Store.

Having bought a portion of the goods of John Shartzer's and filled up with a nice new stock, we will open up at the old stand on March 3d, 1888. We believe it to be to the interest of both buyer and seller to buy and sell for cash whenever it can possibly be done, and get goods at bottom prices. We hope by fair dealing and low prices to merit and secure a fair share of patronage. Good marketable produce taken in exchange for goods. Come and see us.

Madame Fry's Concert.

Madame Fry and her three daughters, of Boston, graduates of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Mr. A. J. Wells, late of Wells Cathedral, England, and Mr. J. A. Sterling, will give a concert in the Glades Hotel dining room, Friday evening, March 16. These refined aud accomplished singers win the indorsement and support of public and press wherever they go. A private advice from a prominent citizen of Frederick says: "The Madame Fry Concert Company was here and played to a crowded house and gave entire satisfaction, so much so the people would like to have them here again." As but few strictly first class concerts stop in Oakland we hope to see this one well patronized.

S. L. Townshend & Son

Are now located in their new store room, on Alder street, opposite Sturgiss' drug store, where they are enabled to wait upon the public, to whom they will sell as low as the lowest, the same quality of goods. Will take all kinds of produce they can handle, at the market price, in exchange for goods. They keep a full line of the celebrated Milwaukee Oil Grain Shoes, for men, women and children; also the Crusader Boots and Shoes.

Death of M. E. Howe.

The sudden tidings of the shocking death of Mellville E. Howe, of Mountain Lake Park, on the B. & O. Railroad, has created profound sorrow in our midst. The sad particulars of his death are too painful to relate. Suffice it to say that he was run over by an engine near Eighty-Cut the night of the 15th and instantly killed. As no one witnessed the fatal act, it is only to be conjectured how he met his death. Some think that he was struck by an east-bound train; others think that in attempting to board a helper he missed his hold and was hurled under the murderous wheels, cutting his body almost in twain, breaking his legs and arms, and crushing out his active life in an instant.

Mr. Howe was 42 years of age. He was born in Norway, Maine, and settled in West Virginia when 20 years of age. He was married in 1875, and had been largely engaged in the lumber trade several years previous to his death.

Melville E. Howe was the personification of "a manly man," and was widely known and universally esteemed. He leaves a wife (formerly Miss Mell. Boughner, of this place), and three interesting young children. The remains of the deceased were brought to Morgantown the 17th and the funeral took place from the residence of Mrs. Howe's mother (Mrs. Louisa J. Boughner, widow of the late Dr. J. V. Boughner) Saturday morning following. Mr. Howe's brother, of Buckhannon, Mr. Al. G. Sturgiss, of Oakland, Mr. Adam H. Bowman, of Rowlesburg, Miss Jennie Smith, of Mountain Lake Park, Mrs. Sprigg Sands, of Fairmont, and other friends accompanied the remains and the stricken widow and orphans to Morgantown; and among other friends present at the funeral from a distance were Jos. E. Sands and wife, of Fairmont; Dr. Van Kirk and wife, of Grafton; Wm. G. Worley, of Kingwood; Cal. G. Painter and wife, of Thornton; and others.

The funeral services were very impressive, conducted by Revs. Buchanan and White, and Miss Jennie Smith.—Morgantown Post.

Sunny Side.

Considering the poor sledding of this winter our energetic farmers have been very successful in hauling large quantities of lime rock upon their farms. While West Virginians are booming their state with conventions, our farmers are preparing to boom their old fields with an immense amount of lime. This farm improving spirit, if kept up for a number of years, will, no doubt, produce good results to the farmers. We are somewhat at a loss to understand what has prompted our farmers to such active engagements in the way of improvements, unless it is that the actions of our Representatives at Annapolis are prompters to diligence.

Our Public Schools are closing up, and so far as we have been able to learn they have been conducted rather satisfactorily in this part of our county to patrons and school officials. We have heard of only one case where the teacher had to resort to the painful necessity of expelling one of his scholars from his school. This is the first case of explusion, as we are informed, in our school district since the adaption of our free public school system. Such a decision on the part of the teacher may prove to be a step in the right direction, as it will most likely have a warning effect upon other unruly characters. Besides a teacher may not be able to handle, physically a large and vicious boy, or his experience in handling such may be limited, in either case, in order to get rid of the annoyance some teachers, it appears, would rather send the offender away from the school. Usually in school each class of offence has its own kind of punishment. If this be true it follows that the offence must be one of great magnitude when it becomes necessary to deprive a fifteen year old boy of the privilege of attending our schools. However, a teacher should remember that as the great oak retains the scar which marks the wound received centuries ago, when a tender sapling, so the youthful soul hurt by a careless hand in teaching may never heal.

The Sunny Side school will close Friday night, March 2d, with a grand and free exhibition.

Made Crazy by Terror.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 27.—Blanchester, Ohio, the Means neighborhood, six miles southeast of this city, is noted for its wealth and intelligence. The people take pride in their blooded stock, fine farms and educate their children at the best schools. One of the most prominent families is William Means, a relative of Governor Foraker, whose father resides near by. Last Thursday evening the young ladies of the neighborhood gave a leap year party at the residence of Mr. Means. The girls assembled sometime before the gentlemen were expected and were having a merry time when two of the number, the Misses Storer, vivacious, fun-loving girls, slipped away, and covering their faces with a dough mask and their forms with sheets suddenly burst in on group of laughing girls.

With a scream most of them fled in terror, but four of them fell in a faint on the floor. Two of the young ladies were speedily restored to consciousness, but the other two, Dora Eakins and Lizzy Chaney, could not be roused, and for two days they remained in a stupor, only to waken hopeless maniacs, who scream and yell in the most agonizing manner. Their condition is such that physicians say they can live only a short time.

The Misses Sterer, whose thoughtless prank caused the awful affair, are themselves prostrated with grief. One is in the delirium of brain fever and her recovery is regarded as doubtful. The whole neighborhood is in mourning over the sad event and the best physicians have been employed.

The Austin (Tex) Daily Dispatch, (Dem.) makes probably the strongest argument against Mr. Cleveland's re-nomination that has yet come from a Democratic source, and one that will likely be used extensively by the friends of Mr. Hill before the next Democratic Convention settles on a candidate. The substance of it is that Mr. Cleveland has subordinated every branch of the public service to the accomplishment of one purpose — his own renomination; that he has administered the financial affairs of the Government in the interest of the Wall street money sharks, and that he has "struck an unwarranted blow at the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country by virtually advocating a policy of free trade, fatal alike to the prosperity of the country and the individual interests of the citizen."

MIZPAH.

We never used the word while thou and I
Walked close together in life's working way:
There was no need for it, when hand and eye
Might meet, content and faithful, every day.
But now, with anguish from a stricken heart,
Mizpah! I cry; the Lord keep watch between
Thy life and mine, that death hath riven apart;
Thy life beyond the awful vail, unseen.
And my poor broken being, which must glide
Through ways familiar to us both, till death
Shall, of a surety, lead me to thy side,
Beyond the chance and change of mortal breath.
Mizpah! yea, love, in all my bitter pain,
I trust God keepeth watch betwixt us twain.

The lips are dumb from which I used to hear
Strong words of counsel, tender words of praise;
Poor I must go my way without the cheer
And sunshine of thy presence all my days.
But God keeps watch my ways and days upon,
On all I do, on all I bear for thee.
My work is left me, though my mate is gone;
A solemn trust hath love bequeathed to me.
I take the task thy languid hand laid down
That summer evening, for mine own alway;
And may the Giver of both cross and crown
Pronounce me faithful at our meeting-day!
Mizpah! the word gives comfort to my pain;
I know God keepeth watch betwixt us twain.

WALL STREET.

The Moral and Financial Wrecks Caused by Speculation.

"Experience is a dear school, but fools will learn in no other," is continually quoted. If fools, or men the reverse of fools, as ordinarily considered, would but learn there, it would be fortunate. But they won't. Every day proves it. He who is made wiser, who changes his conduct, who sees his past folly, after a single bitter experience, is one in a thousand. The majority of men do not mend their ways or morals with any common amount of experience. They still believe, so sanguine are they, so incapable of self-understanding, that what has not yet happened to them, will certainly happen. If they but persevere, the greatest improbability, they think, will be overcome, the apparent impossible will occur, the presumably miraculous will come to pass. What we want to believe, we are nearly sure of. Our ardent desires are interpreted as a foreshadowing of the future.

All this is constantly exemplified in Wall street, which ruins fifty men at least where the ruin of one man is generally known. The evil that it does, not only there, but throughout the country, is seldom suspected. Its baleful influences reaches the remotest corners of the republic. It is continually sapping the means and morals of thousands. No one imagines what a host of persons—for both sexes are included—expend all their surplus in putting up margins on particular stocks. These operate, as a rule, in a small way, seldom losing largely, because they have not much to lose; but the aggregate amount they leave annually in the street is enormous. Many of them do not know the detriment they sustain; they are inclined to believe that in the main they are successful, for they remember only their profits. They do not realize the truth that not one in a hundred men takes out of the street in the end as much as he carries there. The brokers are well aware of this, but it is not to their interest to bruit it. They do not care to discourage their customers. Their policy is to stimulate the gambling spirit, which is more or less in every human breast. The hundreds of members of the Stock Board must live—at least they think they must—and their living is derived from the putters up of margins. Without these the bulk of brokers would be obliged to discontinue business.

Scarcely any defaulter or embezzler in any part of the land but owes his crime directly to speculation in Wall street, and examination of his accounts reveals this. * * *

Were it not for hope Wall street would be deserted. The experience of tens of thousands deters no one from trying to avoid the quicksands in which they have been lost. Each man is convinced that he knows better, that he is shrewder, more intelligent, than his neighbor. Hope, plus egotism, drives most speculators on to their fate. You can tell them nothing; they are aware of it all. They are infatuated by their own vanity, and their superabundance of expectation. They go the same round; arrive at the same end; meet the same fate. Yet each has the temerity to believe that he will prove the exception.

Many of these over-confident speculators come from New England, the South and West, and often with large sums of money, though not large enough to achieve what they are continually attempting. A quarter or half a million is a great deal of money in the country, and a comfortable amount anywhere under any ordinary circumstances. But for operating in the stock market it is insignificant. The adventurers do not understand this, however. They do not remember that certain men in Wall street can command $50,000,000 to $100,000,000, and much more in combination, and that the longest purse generally wins in commercial as well as in other contests. He who can not, or does not, buy a thing outright, who does not own and control it, is never safe, whatever the actual value of the thing. Supposing that gold were not the standard; that some speculator had purchased 10,000 American eagles on a margin, and that they should fall to fifty per cent. discount. If he could not make his margin good he would be sold out, albeit absolutely sure that the eagles were worth ten dollars. Not to be able to furnish margins when required is in Wall street financial damnation. But he who has made a good investment and paid for it need not trouble himself concerning quotations. Their rise or fall can not affect him. He is superior to the manipulations of the market—to the raids of the whole bear clique. Thousands of men see their chances of profit slip away every month simply because they can no longer hold on to their securities, and are often chagrined to see them within a few weeks, perhaps a few days, far above par and buoyant. "If I had only had a little more money," they say then, "how much I might have made!" What countless exclamations and useful regrets of this kind there always are in the money barter of the continent!

I have observed for years how money is swallowed up in the vortex of speculation. I am continually going to Wall street—I feel proof against its temptations—as I like to watch its currents and study human nature, of which it is an excellent school. I meet acquaintances there from every part of the Union. One day I encounter Smith, of Denver, and I inquire after Jones, of Omaha, who told me, three months before, that he had cleared $500,000 by his operations.

"Jones? O, they've scalped him. That last bear attack on the market cleaned him out completely. He has gone home without any thing; and had $400,000 or $500,000, made by land speculation, when he came to New York two years ago."

"I am very sorry for Jones," I reply. "He was a good fellow and full of energy."

"He was all of that," remarked Smith. "But he wasn't quite smart enough for Wall street. I told him last spring how he was going, but he wouldn't believe me. Now he wishes I fancy, that he had taken my advice. A man has to get up pretty early in the morning to stand the racket down here."

"Aren't you afraid, Smith, that they'll get your scalp one of these days?"

"Not a bit. They've tried it often; but I wear all my hair yet. I know their ways. I'm too old a bird to be caught."

Some months later I ran upon Brown, of Chicago, and after a little chat I express the hope that Smith is flourishing.

"Flourishing? Not exactly. Haven't you heard what happened to him? No? He went short on Reading, and he got 'busted' in short order. He's so poor that he's in a cheap boarding house in Harlem. You remember what a figure he used to cut at the Windsor? He's trying to get up again; but he never can. His father left him a handsome fortune ten years ago, and he couldn't raise $500 to-day. He's too hopeful, too reckless. He doesn't know when to take in sail."

"But mayn't you be in the same condition some time? The Stock Exchange is the most uncertain of places. A man of your pursuits is always living on a mine."

"Don't bother about me. I watch these thieves. They can't hurt me. I always sleep with one eye open, and they know it. Chicago is sharper than New York. A man educated there can get on anywhere. Robinson and I—you know Robinson, of St. Louis—haven't got caught yet, and we don't intend to be. We're as wide awake as any of the boys, and they know it."

Six months later I am shaking hands with Robinson in Exchange place, and refer to Brown, hoping he is still prosperous.

"I wish he were; but the fact is that he is broken down. That big tumble in Western Union hurt him irreparably, and he had a stroke of paralysis the next week, and he hasn't been downtown since. It was partial only, but it makes Brown look old. He's grown fifteen years older since last June. His sudden success turned his head, and he went in too deep. I'm afraid he hasn't much left. A man in Wall street has to learn when to be bold and when to be cautious, and Brown never learned this. It was one of the first lessons that I learned, and I learned it thoroughly. I've been operating here six or seven years, and in that time I've seen scores of fellows ruined. But I've never been crippled even, and I ascribe my uniform success to judgment. Some people call it luck. Bah, there's no such thing as luck."

"But is not your judgment fallible? One can not always keep on the right side of the market?"

"Few can; but I am one of the few."

One evening, just after a week of great disturbance in stocks, a disturbance almost approaching panic, I ran upon a well-known broker, many of whose customers are from the West. We fell to taking of the disasters of the week, and he mentioned that Robinson had lost a lot of money on Manhattan, and his margined stocks had been sold out. "He must have lost several hundred thousand dollars, may be $500,000. He is going to St. Louis to dispose of some real estate belonging to his wife, who has entire confidence in him and his ability, and with the new stake he will enter the street again."

"You have been a stock-broker a long while," I asked an acquaintance lately, "what do you candidly think of speculation? What is the result of your observation? Is much money made in Wall street?"

"Almost nothing. Men who make in one thing lose in another. I've been twenty-five years in the street, and of the hundreds who have operated on margins through me I can scarcely recall half a dozen who have not suffered in the long run. If men generally were prudent and sensible, it would be unfortunate for us brokers; we'd have mighty little business. But they are not, and never will be. I frequently advise my friends not to speculate; but it does no good. They learn nothing by the experience of others, and next to nothing by their own. The truth is, nineteen out of every twenty men—perhaps thirty-nine out of forty—are gamblers by constitution. And when they begin gambling they don't know when to leave off. No one can imagine what misery and crime Wall street causes unless he is on the inside. I often wish I had gone into some other business. I have seen so much of the evil of speculation that I never speculate myself."

Since then my broker friend has failed by his rash attempt to keep up a line of stocks that had been drooping for months, and it is doubtful if he can resume. He is reported to me as a desperate speculator for a man of his means, though for many years he was one of the most conservative members of the board.

The worst thing about wall street is that it ruins men morally not less than financially. The habit of speculation is as bad as dram drinking or opium eating. No one knows, when he begins, where he will end. A full course of Wall street is apt to sap the foundations of character, debauch the sentiments, overthrow every principle. It begets with the successful a lust of greed which nothing can satisfy, and with the unsuccessful self-contempt, morbid anxiety, shattered nerves, the agony of alternating hope and despair. Wall street puts human nature in the gutter and keeps it there. Its history is a record of feverishness, infatuation, failure, transgression, remorse, disgrace and suicide. When a trusting men defaults, or blows out his brains, the stock market is generally discovered to be the cause. Not one hundredth part of the mischief it does is divulged. Its tainted names and shattered reputations only occasionally come to the surface. I might give instances that would startle. Proud men, pure women, conscientious clergymen, upright judges are swept away by it. Innocent families all over the land are blasted by it. Its breath is poisonous, its touch is deadly. Outside it is fair and attractive; its buildings are stately, impressive, sumptuous; its frequenters elegant, attractive, plausible. But inside is the life and spirit that Calvin attributed to hell.—Junius Henri Browne, in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

SHORT-SIGHTED PEOPLE.

Individuals Who Do Not Recognize Their Friends on the Street.

"Why don't you recognize that man? You know him perfectly well, don't you?" "Certainly; but he has cut me three or four times, and I propose that he shall do the recognizing hereafter." This isn't, by any means, an infrequent dialogue. It opens up the question of the inability of some people, even of those who are not short-sighted, to recognize other people readily. There are men and women whom we know and whom we can not suspect of any prejudice against us or any disposition to "cut" us, who ordinarily make no sign of recognition when they meet us. More than that, there are people whom we know and like perfectly well, who accuse us of "cutting" them in public.

The writer has an acquaintance whom he occasionally meets on perfectly friendly terms, and who has honorably proved his courtesy, and yet who never recognizes him on the street. It is not a slight. "He never recognizes anybody," his friends will tell you. And yet he has no ordinary defect of vision. His case is one of a number which seem to prove that there is such a thing as the recognizing faculty, and that some people may be deficient in it, such as others are deficient in the musical sense or in the power of distinguishing colors. One's identity has to be impressed upon such people's consciousness by a long series of recognitions before it can be said to have established itself in their sense, so devoid is that sense of acuteness. Such people are rather to be commiserated than congratulated. They are likely to be unjustly accused of snobbery or indifference, and to have to carry a burden of unfriendly prejudice on account of their defect.—Buffalo Commercial.

FOUND IN THE SNOW.

An Honest Farmer Leaves a Package at the Police Station.

"They ain't mine, and I'm going to take 'em to police headquarters," said a farmer on the market yesterday as he bundled up several articles of clothing.

"Find 'em on the road?" asked one of the men he had been talking with.

"No, sir. Found 'em right in front of my stable door the other morning. There's a pair of mittens, a cap, an old handkerchief, a plug of tobacco and a necktie."

"How did they get there?"

"Well, I figure that a tramp opened the door and walked in to find a lodging place. I keep the door unlocked, but never go in by it. I turned the old mare around last fall with her heels within two feet of the door."

"And what?"

"Well, about the time that tramp stepped in she let go with both feet. One foot hit him just a little below the belt, and the other under the chin. It was nine feet from the door to the spot where he lit. There was evidence that he pawed around for a spell, got up and fell into a wagon-box, got up again and fell out, and then he made a bee-line across the meadow for the section-line road. He didn't come back for his duds, and I'll just leave 'em where they'll be safe when his memory returns and he wants 'em.—Detroit Free Press.

LEAP-YEAR PRIVILEGES.

Time-Honored Rights and Prerogatives of the Gentler Sex.

It is probable that many of the fair and at least an equal number of the unfair sex have scarcely bestowed a thought upon the fact that 1888 is leap year, in which the ladies' law, as it is called, may prevail.

In three years out of every four man has the privilege of "popping the question," and the annoyance of sometimes having a plain-spoken "No" for the reply. On the fourth year woman may propose, if it so please her.

A lady has the privilege in leap year of suggesting marriage between herself and a bachelor acquaintance. In the event of his refusing, the penalty is that the ungallant gentleman shall present the tender damsel with a new silk dress.

There is a reservation, however, that the right to claim this penalty depends on the circumstance that when she proposed the damsel was the wearer of a scarlet petticoat, which (or a little of the lower portion of which) she must exhibit to the gentleman, the understood idea being that the silken dress shall cover the petticoat, and thus assuage dire feminine indignation at the rejection of her offered hand.

If any of the readers catch a glimpse in 1888—say in a high wind, or when a carriage or car is entered, or a muddy street crossed—of the slightest bit of scarlet in a lady's most comfortable and usually unexhibited garment, they may imagine that she has quitted the house with the dire intent of asking somebody to marry her or of getting the silk dress mentioned.

It is said that in a work entitled "Courtship, Love and Matrimony," published in 1606, ten years before the death of Shakespeare, is this explanation regarding ladies' privileges in leap-year:

"Albeit, it is now become a part of the common lawe, in regard to social relations of life, that as often as every bissextile year doth return, the ladies have the sole privilege, during the time it continueth, of making love unto the men, which they do, either by wordes or lookes, as to them it seemeth proper; and, moreover, no man will be entitled to benefit of clergy who dothe in any way treate her proposal with slight or contumely."

This quotation is given by a correspondent of Notes and Queries, but there are some words in it which were scarcely in common use in Shakespeare's time.

"Social relations of life" is a comparatively modern phrase; and though the word "relations" is used once by Shakespeare, "social" never was. Oddly the word "contumely," though not given in "Ayscough's Concordance," occurs in "the proud man's contumely," which is put into one of Hamlet's most thoughtful soliloquies.

The following is the statute in the old Saxon code referring to leap year:

"Albeit, as often as leape yearre dothee occure, the woman holdeth prerogative over the menne in matters of courtships, love and matrimonie; so that, when the lady proposeth it shall not be lawful for the man to say her nae, but shall entertain her proposall in all gude curtesie."

A Scotch statute of 1228 reads as follows:

"It is statut and ordaint that during the reine of her maist blessit majestie, ilk forth year, known as leap year, ilk maiden ladye of baith high and low estait shall have liberty to bespeak ye man she likes; albyit, if he refuses to take her to be wif, he shall be mulcted in the sum of one pound (£1) or less, as his estait mai be, except and awis if he can make it appear that he is betrothed to one woman, and then he shall be free."

Leap year naturally makes us think of marriage; and we hope all the young ladies and widows will be bold enough to "pop the question," and do it without blushing or stammering. Now is your opportunity.—Troy (N. Y.) Times.

ADOPTED CHILDREN.

How to Make Adoptions According to All the Forms of Law.

The love of children is so much a part of our natural instincts that it leads many childless parents to adopt as their own some child, the love of which they hope shall satisfy the needs of their nature in this regard. They so often do this by mere word of mouth and the taking home of the little one that it is well to know that, unless the adoption is made formally and by prescribed legal steps, they are only making future sorrow and vexation for themselves instead of the happiness they have anticipated. For at some future time, when it may have become convenient, or desirable, the former owners or guardians of the child may claim it and take it away, though they should tear out the new parent's heartstrings with it. It is fitting, then, in order that there shall be no trouble by and by, that the adoption of the child, when made, shall be made according to all the forms of law. These require the petition to the court of both the husband and wife desiring to adopt, accompanied by the written consent of the child's parents or other guardians, or, in the absence of such persons, of some one appointed by the court to represent them. When this petition has been granted, and the adoption has been sanctioned by the court, it can not be undone, and the child is, to all the intents and purposes of law, the child of its adopting father and mother, and can inherit from or through them every thing that is not entailed upon descendants by blood. Any appeal from the sanction of the court must be made within a year, or otherwise it is useless.—Harper's Bazar.

TEMPERANCE READING.

THE OLD CLOCK.

"Tick, tock," goes the old clock!
Its ancient case is black with age,
Yet its tongue takes, with steady gauge,
The measure of the moment's doom,
And through the lonely keeping-room
"Tick, tock," sounds the old clock.

The moments slowly interlock
In sighs. She vainly tries to sew,
Shunning the fact she soon must know;
A whisper seems to pierce the gloom
As once: "Mother, why don't he come?"
"Tick, tock," answers the clock.

Slowly swings the old clock!
A deeper grief than that of death
Drips in her tears, and chills her breath
With voiceless fear; he, staggering, nears
With bloated face and ribald jeers.
"Tick, tock," goes the old clock.

"Tick, tock," swings the old clock.
Hark! was that an echoing sigh,
Or the wind's rising lullaby?
How sweet to slip out on Life's tide,
And into Heaven's harbor ride!
Solemnly swings the old clock.

THE BIBLE VIEW.

The Scriptural Argument Concerning the Use of Wine and Kindred Beverages.

The evil of drunkenness is as old as the art of making wine, which certainly dates back as far as the time of Noah—and it is probable that the antediluvians possessed it. There are many references to wine-drinking and to drunkenness in the Bible—the former without censure, and the latter always with reproach and condemnation. Down through the circling centuries it has always been so as regards the latter. Yet at the present day there are men who attempt to "steal the livery of Heaven to serve" the Rum Devil in, who are foolish enough to argue that as the Scriptures do not prohibit the use of wine, and as our Saviour's first miracle was the turning of water into wine at the marriage feast held in Cana of Galilee, that the use of it and similar beverages should not be prohibited to-day.

We pity the weakness of any one who could be convinced by so poor an argument. These "drinking Christians" seek to make the religion they profess a bulwark for the giant vice of the nineteenth century, which is the cause of more poverty, suffering, crime and death than any other. They forget, in so doing, this one great fact:

Distilled liquors (whisky, brandy, gin, rum, etc.) were not known at the time the Scriptures were written.

The great ally of the devil, the still, was not known. Wine was the only intoxicant. Suppose that the modern doctored and drugged whisky had been the drink upon the table at the Cana wedding instead of weak wine; do these foolish ones who think Christ's first miracle an argument for the use of alcoholic drinks think for an instant that He would have turned a jug or two of water into "forty-rod" whisky? Do they suppose that He would have sanctified what would necessarily have been a drunken orgy by being present and thus, tacitly at least, giving countenance to its use?

Had whisky and the whole list of infernal compounds of which the worm of the still is the fruitful parent been known when the two tables of stone, graven by the finger of God, were delivered to Israel's lawgiver amid the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai, can any one doubt that among the list of "Thou shalt nots" their use would have been included?

It is a fact—and none is more clear in the pages of history—that drunkenness was one of the minor vices up to the time that the art of distilling was invented. There was nothing which could intoxicate save wine alone. Whisky and its congeners were unknown; and the art of brewing—of concocting nauseous liquids containing alcohol through a process which involves the partial rotting of grain—was practiced, if practiced at all, only among barbaric people. None of the civilized nations of antiquity used beer and similar compounds.

Wine was the only intoxicant. There are some good people who are really troubled by the so-called "Biblical argument" for the use of wine, who have gone to an infinite deal of trouble to prove that the wine made by Jesus at Cana was the freshly-expressed juice of the grape, before it had undergone the alcoholic fermentation, and therefore it was incapable of producing intoxication as the fresh juice of apples—"sweet" cider. We do not think it profitable to waste time on such a trivial discussion. In point of fact, the case is incapable of actual proof, one way or the other. That intoxicating wine was known, is absolutely certain, both from Bible passages and from profane history; that non-intoxicating—freshly-made—wine was also used as a beverage, is equally clear. Who can tell which it was?

And, after all, what does it really matter which it was? There are many passages of Scripture which condemn intoxication. Bear in mind these facts:

1. That wine was the only intoxicant known;

2. That it was the pure juice of the grape, generally diluted with water; it was not "fortified" with cologne spirits, nor drugged and doctored with chemicals and coloring materials;

3. That drunkenness was by no means as prevalent among the Jews as it is among all peoples to-day;

4. That wine, made in the simple manner then followed, contains a very small per cent. of alcohol, and that it would require the drinking of a very large quantity to produce inebriation.

Then read the following Scriptural references to the evils of its misuse:

Proverbs xxxi, 4-5: It is not for kings to drink wine, * * lest they drink and forget the law. * *

Judges xiii, 4: And, therefore, beware, I pray thee, and drink not any wine. * * *

Ephesians v, 18: And be not drunk with wine. * *

Proverbs xxiii, 20-21: Be not among wine-bibbers, * * for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty.

First Corinthians v, 11: But now I have written unto you not to keep company * * or a drunkard. * *

Isaiah xxviii, 1: Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim. * *

Joel i, 5: Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine.

First Corinthians vi, 10: Nor thieves, * * nor drunkards, * * shall inherit the kingdom of God.

Luke xxi, 34: And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness. * *

Romans xiii, 13: Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness. * *

Galatians v, 19-21: Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: * * * drunkenness, revilings, and such like. * *

Proverbs xx, 1: Wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.

Proverbs xxi, 17: He that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich.

Proverbs xxiii, 29-30: Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath babblings? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine.

Proverbs xxiii, 31: Look not then upon the wine when it is red.

Hosea iv, 11: * * Wine, and new wine, take away the heart.

But, our friends argue that the Scriptures do not prohibit the use of wine; they only condemn its abuse. True; but, taking the tenor of the injunctions for our guidance from Genesis to Revelations, and bearing in mind the limited and slow means of intoxication of that day with the limitless and rapid means of the present with our deadly whisky and kindred distilled drinks, and answer us this question: If these latter-day liquors, producing quick drunkenness, had been then known, is it not clear, from the tenor of the Scriptures, that their use would have been forbidden? The answer of every thinking man must be in the affirmative. The denunciations of prophet and apostle would have rung out against all who dared to touch these life and soul destroying beverages, and the sacred volume would have bristled with commands to abstain entirely.

No man who is a Christian at heart can either drink himself or countenance the use of rum by others. Remembering that no man begins to drink with the intention of becoming a drunkard, but that the occasional glass is taken until the habit is so fixed that it can not be broken, and drags its victim down to poverty, death and hell, he can not take the first step into danger himself, nor permit his example to lead others into temptation.

It matters not whether Christ made wine by a miracle, nor whether He drank it. It is not wine that makes the trouble nowadays, but whisky. The devil never had so potent a servant as rum has been ever since the first whisky-still was put into operation. It will not do to countenance the use of rum, for the use as certainly leads to abuse as sin leads to damnation. And every Christian who tries to carry the "new commandment" of our Saviour into his daily life can do so if he throws the weight of his influence into the effort to pulverize the rum power.—Toledo Blade.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

THE class of '90, Cornell College, have decided that no wine shall be served at their banquets.

THE Homiletic Review estimates the loss to New York State through the liquor business at $148,000,000.

IN Rio Janeiro the punishment for drunkenness is a tin mask placed over the face and fastened behind with a lock.

M. PASTEUR says habitual users of intoxicants, if bitten by a mad-dog, are more difficult to cure than temperate persons.

MRS. BUELL, Corresponding Secretary of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, at Nashville, reports a total membership in the Nation of 136,477 in 6,505 local unions. There were 102,521 enrolled in the Loyal Legion.

ACCORDING to a liquor law passed in France, every person who may be condemned twice by the police, for open drunkenness will be held incapable of voting, of elective eligibility, and of being named for the jury or any public office.

AT a meeting of the St. Pancras, London, Total Abstinence Association, held a few days ago, the president, Dr. Richardson, in the course of his address, said that "in England and Wales there were 4,000,000 of people living either in a state of absolute inebriety or of intemperate habits, and out of these something like 1,500,000 come under the hands of the police." This is indeed a deplorable showing of the prevalence of intemperance in England, and it ought to draw the attention of her rulers to the necessity of doing something to elevate and improve the social and moral condition of her own population instead of seeking to crush and degrade the Irish people.—Irish World.

OUR readers will remember that last June the Kentucky distillers made a contract together not to make any whisky for a year, in order to enhance the price. It now transpires that a number of them have broken this contract, and manufactured whisky, greatly to their own profit and to the disadvantage of their more honest neighbors. A meeting of the association was held in Louisville, and Mr. Herman Beckurts was instructed to bring suit against all signers of the contract who had broken it. This looks to us a little like encroaching upon men's "personal liberty," this making them "take a pledge" not to carry on their "legitimate business," and prosecuting them for breaking it, but if they can stand it we can. The effect of such strenuous measures was immediately seen in the advance in price in whisky from $1.05 to $1.08 per gallon.—Union Signal.

A trick many drivers have is, that of wrapping newspapers around their stockings before they put their boots on.

—According to the Hon. William I. Bowditch, one-tenth of all the taxes in Massachusetts are paid by the women. In Rockford, Ill., the women pay two-thirds of the taxes. In some towns the percentage is large, but for all of that these very women are not by law citizens, and have no voice in the administration of public affairs.

—An Iowa woman thoughtfully put two dozen eggs in her nice, warm bed to keep them from freezing while she spent the afternoon and evening with a friend. Returning late at night, she disrobed and plunged in. Shriek? Well, the one she lifted up her voice with caused the cat to dash through the window in terror, and roused the neighbors. The eggs did not freeze.—Exchange.

—The annual loss caused by insects in the United States is estimated at about $150,000,000, that on cotton alone being $15,000,000. The insects increase with the advance of civilization, on account, doubtless, of the greater abundance of the food furnished them. Every vegetable product and every variety of fruit and flowers are attended by special parasites, each of which thrives on its respective food-plant.

She took an axe and cut off the bird's head and feet before the man could release his hands.

It seldom goes to the water alone, but when Mr. White is ferrying it swims by the side of the boat. It doesn't keep the company of any living thing save Mr. White, to whom it seems entirely devoted.

—They tell down East of a poor fellow who owned a remarkably fat hog, and who also owed a rich man. The hog was about all the property the poor debtor had worth levying on, and the law exempted a man's only pig. One day the creditor meeting the debtor said, "You need another pig, let me send you a nice little one." The poor man was astonished. "Why, I owe for the hog I've got now," he stammered. "Never mind, you need another one, and I'll send it," and he did, and the little pig was put in the pen by the side of the big one. In less than an hour the constable came and attached the fat hog and took it away, and thus the law and the rich man were satisfied.

DESERVING OF HELP.

How a Man of Nerve and Spirit Lost His Entire Fortune.

A haggard-looking tramp stopped at a house in Kentucky and called for the "landlord." Old Major Bowles, a well-known character in Central Kentucky, stepped out on the gallery and in a rather ungentle voice demanded:

"What do you want here, sah?"

"My dear sir," said the tramp, taking off his tattered hat and bowing with a sort of meek despair, "you see me in hard luck."

"Hang your luck!" exclaimed the Major.

"I can heartily endorse that sentiment," replied the tramp, "but I am not here to indorse or to receive indorsement but to ask for something to sustain the body. I am starving."

"That's not my fault," said the Major. "The world is pretty well filled with just such starving fellows as you are, but I have never heard of one of them dying. I don't mind giving a man a little something to eat, but I'll be blowed if I intend to encourage your infernal laziness. Like all the rest of your tribe, I suppose that you claim to be quite a respectable fellow?"

"Yes, sir."

"Of course. And I reckon you once had money?"

"Yes, sir."

"Of course. But you lost it on account of a rascally partner?"

"No, sir."

"Stocks went down, then?"

"No, I had nothing to do with stocks."

"Well, then, the bank broke."

"I had nothing to do with banks?"

"Why, this is strange. Over-cropped yourself and there came a drought?"

"No, I had nothing to do with farming."

"Is it possible!" said the Major, now keenly interested. "O, I see, you bought a steamboat."

"No."

"Saw-mill?"

"No, sir."

"And yet you had money and lost it?"

"Yes, sir."

"But how."

"I lost it playing poker."

"What!" exclaimed the Major. "Why, my dear sir, you are not the rascal I took you for. Why, you are a man of nerve and spirit. Come in, and help yourself to any thing there is in the house."—Arkansaw Traveler.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

How Two Enterprising and Industrious Ladies Make a Living.

Here is the way one woman turns the honest penny: She is a seamstress by trade and a good one, but after all her faithful industry is barely able to eke out a scanty living with her needle. Constant and weary toil makes madame none the less a lady, however, and one of the first requirements of her life is to occupy pleasant apartments. Rent per month is say five dollars. With a hundred and one drains on a small treasury this is a considerable sum to compass, and the cleverness with which she manages to secure the amount would put to shame many an older financier. In the first instance one dollar was invested at the baker's, which as every one knows will buy two dozen fat loaves.

She next secured twenty-four regular customers to pay five cents apiece as she delivered the bread early every morning, carrying it warm and crisp from the oven. This, as will be seen, gives her twenty cents clear profit a day. Being carefully deposited in a savings bank on the mantle shelf, behold when the landlord knocks the required sum is all ready for payment. The early walk in no way interferes with her regular duties, but on the contrary serves as a good constitutional, a healthful preparation for the sedentary employment of the rest of the day. Hearing of a woman who has courage and energy to do this sort of thing helps others along, no matter what their calling or pursuit.

The first woman to occupy the position of cane weigher on a sugar plantation—a place of some trust and responsibility—was a young girl from the North. Fortune took her up in the coast country this past autumn, and, asking work, the situation was offered and immediately accepted. She went to work without hesitation, and, giving perfect satisfaction to her employers, proved there is still another line of work opened to those of her sex looking for employment.—*N. O. Sleep as a Medicine.

The cry for rest has always been louder than the cry for food, not that it is more important, but it is often harder to obtain. The best rest comes from sound sleep. Of two men or women, otherwise equal, the one who sleeps the best will be the most moral, healthy and efficient. Sleep will do much to cure irritability or temper, peevishness and uneasiness. It will restore to vigor an overworked brain. It will build up and make strong a weary body. It will cure a headache. Indeed, we might make a long list of nervous and other maladies that sleep will cure. The cure of sleeplessness requires a clean, good bed, sufficient exercise to produce weariness, pleasant occupation, good air, not too warm a room, a clear conscience and avoidance of stimulants and narcotics. For those who are overworked, haggard and nervous, who pass sleepless nights, we recommend the adoption of such habits as shall secure sleep, otherwise life will be short, and what there is of it sadly imperfect.—Medical Times.

AN AUTOGRAPH MART.

Value of the Signatures of a Number of Famous Men and Women.

One of the new fads of the season is the collection of autograph letters from living men and women. One day this week a Broadway shopkeeper showed me an odd collection and told me the prices that he hoped to get for each letter. One from Browning, the poet, is marked $4.50. A humorous letter to President Garfield, signed Mark Twain, is held at $5. The great humorist says:

"It seems to me that it is better to have a good man's flattering estimate of my influence—and keep it—than to fool it away with trying to get him an office."

A brief note signed by Wilkie Collins, the novelist, is held at $1.50. Another from Sir Charles Dilke, the English statesman, whose escapades caused such a sensation a year or more ago, is valued at $1. One from General John C. Fremont, the pathfinder, and the first candidate of the Republican party for President, is ticketed $2.75. An autograph verse and signature by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes is $2.25. A short letter written by eloquent Bob Ingersoll is not valued very highly. It may be purchased for 75 cents. One from the Marquis of Lorne, ex-Governor-General of Canada, may be had for $1.75. Justin McCarthy's autograph is valued at the same figure. John Ruskin's is more highly prized. It is held at $4.50. Clark Russell, the author of so many weird tales of the sea, has a name of some pecuniary moment. It is marked $2.50. A scrap of paper signed by General W. T. Sherman will be sold for $5. A letter of Spurgeon, the famous English divine, in which he mentions the Tory press is "bullying me very badly," may be had for $1.25. A letter from Charles Algernon Swinburne, the poet, apologizing for his illegible handwriting, is valued at $4. One from Sir Arthur Sullivan, of operatic fame, may be had for $2.75. Another from Alma Tadema, the distinguished English artist, is held at $1.75. A badly written note from Edmund Yates, the English journalist, is quoted at $1.25. The signature of Albani, the sweet singer, may be had for $4.50. Horatio Alger, Jr., the writer of boys' books, is not so high priced His may be had for 50 cents. Lawrence Barrett, the actor, can get $1 for his own signature; George Bancroft, the historian, $1; James Gillespie Blaine, $1.25; Benjamin F. Butler, 50 cents: George William Curtis, 25 cents; Samuel Sunset Cox, the witty member of the House, 50 cents; James Freeman Clark, the eminent Boston divine, $1; Simon Cameron, the Nestor of Keystone State politics, 75 cents; George W. Childs, Editor of the Philadelphia Ledger, 50 cents, and the signature of his old enemy, Chas. A. Dana, Editor of the New York Sun, at the same figure; Rose Eytinge, the actress, 50 cents; Edison, the Menlo Park wizard, 50 cents; Emily Faithful, the English philanthropist and writer, $1.25; Cyrus W. Field, $1; Mary J. Holmes, the novelist, 50 cents; ex-President Hayes, 50 cents; Joel Chandler Harris, "Uncle Remus," 50 cents; James Russell Lowell, $1.50; Modjeska, the actress, 50 cents; Levi P. Morten, ex-Minister to France, only 25 cents; Louise Chandler Moulton, the Boston writer, 75 cents, Bill Nye, 50 cents, Edward E. Rice, the theatrical manager, 25 cents, and Stuart Robson, the comedian 75 cents; a poem by Stedman, $6: a signature by Carl Schurz, 50 cents; one by John Sherman, 75 cents; Richard A. Proctor, the astronomer, $1.25; and Zola, the French novelist, $6.50. Three signatures by people of the stage may be had for 50 cents; they are Fanny Davenport, Mary Anderson and Wilson Barrett. Senator Evarts, Roscoe Conkling, ex-Senator Mahone, Senator Chandler, Fred Douglass, Speaker Carlisle, Steve Dorsey, Samuel J. Randall and Senator Vest for 25 cents each. The most costly signature is that of Ouida, the novelist, $7.50, and the cheapest Boston's only Mike Kelly, the ball tosser, 10 cents.—N. Y. Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

An Accommodating Climate.

"Pretty cold out your way, winters, isn't it? Mercury twenty below, and all that sort of thing?"

"Why, yes," said the Minneapolis man, "it is kind o' cold; but then the fact is, the cold sort o' strikes right in and takes hold, and stays there; and you really aren't conscious of it till it begins to thaw out of your system in the spring. And then the weather 's warm, and you can stand it."—Puck.

—The colored school at Hawkinsville, Ga., to be known as the Dempsey Clarke Institute, was named after Dempsey Clarke, who years ago was sold as a slave on the block by the sheriff at Hawkinsville. He ran away from his new master, took to the swamps, and for years lived as a runaway slave. He was at length captured by dogs, but again ran away. His owner sold him while yet in the woods. Dempsey was pleased with his new owner, and became his most trusty servant. After the war he became a landowner, prospered, and is now one of the most prominent planters of Houston County, and his liberal gifts have resulted in the new school.

—A rubber ball, two inches smaller than the pipe, was placed in one end of a new natural gas main in McKeesport, and five pounds pressure suddenly turned on. The ball turned several sharp corners, passed through two T joints up six feet to the top of the regulator and landed at the other end of the main, a mile distant, in forty-five seconds, actual time.

A BIT OF BUNTING.

Something About Flags of All Kinds and Their Manufacture.

After all, what would the tight little islands known as Great Britain amount to if no Union Jack flaunted their power in the face of the world? And, as for that matter, the "land of the free and the home of the brave," if there were no stars and stripes to wave gloriously over men and masts in four quarters of the globe? It would signify in the latter instance the squeezing dry of every inflammable drop of patriotic sentiment that ignites in the breasts of all full-blooded Americans at the bare sight of a certain arrangement of colors. Citizens of these United States rise ardently to the flag at all times and under all circumstances, and it is one of the delightful sensations invariably recorded in a journey abroad, when they tell of their hearts swelling with honest pride at sight of the floating red, white and blue.

It seems a bit curious, too, when one comes to think over all the mischief these national rags have wrought, for they lead men straight on to death and destruction as gayly as though luring him to the surest goal of life's desires. They may indeed be mere symbols of weightier realities, but, after all, much of the purest love and honor of many peoples lie in embroidered folds of silk or bunting. They are humbled as their standard droops, and triumphant as its colors dictate. Flags are the outward and noticeable signs of benevolence, might, wealth and victory, war, peace or disaster, disease, death and festivity, as well as protection and defiance. The making of flags is a business of importance in all seaport towns, for there is a continual demand for such articles aboard all kinds of craft.

It is simply astonishing to see how short a time it takes for sea, wind and weather to whip the stoutest stuffs into ribbons. When the breeze blows fair, and with sunshine plenty, a bunting banner may be carried at the mast head some three months or more; but let one gale ruffle the waters, and before the pretty strip can be lowered, the tempest has blown it into a bunch of tatters. Sailors, as a rule, make all signals used on their vessels, and even some of the larger standards, but each one is supposed to carry a set of flags belonging peculiarly to its rank which can only be manufactured on land.

All the merchantmen have their flags made here, and it is quite interesting to turn over those of the various European countries for comparison. When the Brazilian man-of-war was visiting this city the captain ordered a complete set for his ship, which was made of the finest quality of materials, and numbers have been sent since to Ecuador, Mexico, Guatemala and other South American nations.

In spite of all temptation one must yield the palm of beauty to the flag chosen by this country. It is unique, striking and elegant compared with the great similarity existing among foreign banners. The finest and daintiest work is put on a silk national flag, for, like tapestry, the embroidery shows the same on both sides. The silk is always rich, and nothing can be prettier than the azure field with stars sown thickly on the deep blue ground. Looking over the stock the reporter came across some yellow flags, designed for quarantine stations; others for naval dispatch were white squares with five blue clubs worked in floss, but more than all others were the French flags used on the 14th of July.—N. O. Times-Democrat.

A SEA TELEPHONE.

Communicating Under Water by Means of a Novel Device.

Some interesting experiments have lately been made to test the feasibility of enabling ships to communicate with one another by means of what may be called a sea telephone. It is known that water is a good transmitter of sound, and that the velocity with which sound is conveyed through it is about four times as great as its velocity through the air.

Experiments made on the Lake of Geneva long ago showed that the sound of a submerged bell could be heard by means of a special form of ear trumpet, also placed beneath the water, at a distance of several miles from the bell.

Mr. Boyer, of H. M. S. Malabar, has ately in a measure revived this experiment, only he has used a telephone instead of an ear-trumpet as receiver of the sounds transmitted.

The apparatus consists of a large, flat bell or gong placed just below the water line at a ship's side, and which is so connected by means of a tube with the deck that a hammer can be made to act on the bell at will. This is the transmitter. The receiver consists of a Bell telephone, with a large diaphragm placed in the center of the bell and connected by means of wires with another telephone on the deck of the ship. This second instrument is held to the observer's ear.

By means of this apparatus it is found that sound can be readily conveyed through the water for upward of a mile, and it is claimed that signals can be thus made under the sea which will be quite independent of fog or stormy weather.

There seems to us to be only one weak point in this method of signaling, and that is the want of a means of calling the attention of the distant receiver when the transmitter wishes to send a signal. In the working of the ordinary telephone each observer has his signaling bell, but this is impossible with the sea telephone. In the absence of fog, too, the ordinary system of signaling, either by means of flags, or at night by flashing lights, meets all requirements. —London Graphic.

TENDERFOOT EDISON.

The Great Electrician Has an Amusing Experience on the Plains.

At a dinner party at the Presidio the other evening, one of the officers related some anecdotes of Thomas Edison.

"He is the most unpractical man in the world," said the Captain. "I remember well the summer of '78, the season of the total eclipse of the sun. A lot of scientific men were there—Pro. Trouvelot, of Cambridge; Harkness, the well-known astronomer; John L. Draper, and many more of them—besides a number of army people, who went up from some of the forts to a little station on the Union Pacific, called Separation, to view the phenomenon.

"Edison was one of the party, and they made observations, drew sketches, took photographic impressions, and when the eclipse was over compared notes as to the sensations they had experienced. Draper gave it as his opinion that if it were possible for it to continue an hour numbers of people would commit suicide, and it would leave generally a bad effect on the digestion and the nervous system.

"Edison, you know, is quite deaf, and the strangest thing was, during an hour or so of the densest partial eclipse, he recovered his hearing to almost a normal degree. They were up there a couple of days before the event occurred, and we officers had our rifles with us, and hunted antelope and deer. Edison was imbued with the sportsman spirit, and handing one hundred dollars to a man, said: 'Get me a gun, will you?" The man brought the gun, which had cost seventy-five dollars, and handed him the change, which he returned, saying: 'Here, I want some powder, and things; get me the balance in ammunition. I s'pose twenty-five dollars' worth is about all I can carry, isn't it?'

"Every one laughed at the picture of Edison carrying twenty-five dollars' worth of cartridges about his person.

"They had a stuffed jack rabbit at the station, which some clever telegraph man had prepared for the befooled emigrants to shoot at.

"This was set rigidly up in the sagebrush, and pointed out to Edison, who had never shot at any real game before. He deliberately drew bead on it, and, after a full minute's aiming, he pulled the trigger.

"He didn't come anywhere near the animal, but was very much excited. 'Wait,' said he; 'if the thing will only stand still five minutes longer, I'll kill him, sure.'

"Bang!" went the gun again, amid the suppressed titters of the crowd, and again, as before, the rabbit calmly viewed the horizon, with his round, unblinking glass eyes.

"Well, I do believe Edison fired away at that thing no less than a dozen times before the idea crept into his electric brain that it was a put-up job. He took it quite good-naturedly."—Leslie's Budget.

SECRETS OF THE DEEP.

A New York Diver Chats About His Unromantic Calling.

The most unpleasant thing a diver can meet is the dead body of a human being. It is a popular delusion that all drowned men come to the surface after several days. Probably they would if they were left alone and were not attacked by wharf-rats, eels and fishes. But in the Hudson they are always attacked in this way within an hour or two after they are submerged. Once attacked, that ends it. The breaking of the skin diffuses something, it may be a scent around, and then every thing travels for that body to get a square meal. Long before decomposition it is so cut and riddled that what gases are formed have no chance to accumulate and inflate the walls of the abdomen. We divers never touch bodies in this state, because it brings the worst luck possible. The only exception to the rule I know was the body of a man who had committed suicide. He had tied around his neck a bag of some heavy stuff, shot or lead pipe, it may have been, and had jumped in from a ferry-boat or a pier-head near to shore. When I came across it it was dilated with its own gases and seemed in the half light under the water to be a stout man trying to swim to the surface, but anchored down by a heavy weight. There was so much travel that it had kept the fishes away. A single cut of my knife severed the cord and the body rose to the surface, where it was found and afterwards identified as that of a German cobbler, who had been drinking to excess. Other somber objects beneath the water are the remains of wrecks and worn-out boats. Most are gray and black in color naturally. They become covered with greenish scum and slime and with the dark ooze of the river. They are of no value and so we never bother ourselves about them.

There is very little romance or beauty about a diver's life. The white sand beaches and coral floors, the brilliant colored fishes and the exquisite forests of the sea that the reading public never weary of in Jules Verne and other writers, do not exist. It is cold, dark, filthy and dead. The first time you go down there is a novelty and excitement about it which are very pleasant. When these wear off you feel like the grave-diggers who every morning go to work in the great cemeteries. You must be quick, alert and sober. You must keep your eyes and ears always open and be ready for any thing. If you don't you'll probably feed the fishes.—N. Y. Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A MODERN WONDER.

Sunstroke Caused by Agencies Produced by an Electric Battery.

A highly interesting and suggestive account of what may be called sunstroke by electricity was recently printed. At the Creuzot foundry in France an electric furnace is used, in which the light equals that of 100,000 candles, and the heat is such that steel melts like butter in a few seconds. Now people standing about at a distance of a few yards feel no heat, a thermometer five yards away does not indicate much increase of temperature. Yet a subtle influence is at work, and a spectator who remains for an hour or two is said to experience "a burning sensation, with more or less pain in the neck, face and forehead, the skin at the same time assuming a coppery red tint. Later symptoms are headache and sleeplessness. Afterwards the skin of the face gradually peals off in broad flakes, while the complexion is left of a fine brick color." The symptoms are those of continued exposure to hot, bright sunlight. In extreme cases they are those of sunstroke, though the only apparent agent has been intense light. As to this it must be remembered that the quality of radiant heat is to pass through the air without appreciably rising its temperature. When it meets a calorific body that body is heated, as illustrated in a room warmed by a glowing fire. The air may not be warmer than fifty degrees, while the furniture is warm to the touch, yet no sense of chilliness is experienced, because the body and its clothes have the property of absorbing the heat thrown out from the fire. In the same way the intense heat of the electric focus may exert its influence at a distance. The value of the observation, if it is correctly reported, lies in its suggestion as to the way in which sunstroke of the indicated type is produced. It suggests, for instance, that the whole matter may be a question of the rapidity of the vibrations originated by the luminous body, whether those that are known under the name of light, or those slower ones that are described by the word heat. Molecular changes in the system due to heat, or light, or both, produce in some way not yet definitely explained, the affection known as sunstroke. Whatever throws light on the conditions or nature of the changes helps to clear up a very obscure and puzzling subject, specially related to the functions of the nervous system, and bearing at the same time on the mechanics of etherial vibrations. Heat, light and chemical effect are all connected, and very possibly all involved in this particular problem. It offers magnificent possibilities for students who have courage and patience to attack it.—Hartford Courant.

STRANGE FETICHES.

Some of Those Cherished and Worshiped by the Congo Negroes.

Every Congo negro carries a M'kissi upon himself, and there may be thousands of kinds of them that escape the eyes of the white man. The N'ganga, or medicine man, is usually the fabricant of the fetich, and whatever he finds good to impose upon his simple-minded, credulous brethren for a high price, sewed up in cloth or leather or inclosed in a goat's horn, is doubly valuable in the eyes of its new possessor because he believes that his M'kissi stands in a personal relation to himself, and he can not be induced to give it up to a white man for any price.

Among those amulets are dried snakes' and lizards' heads, little pieces of skin, feathers of certain birds and parts of known poison plants. The eye teeth of leopards are an exceedingly valuable fetich on the Kroo coasts, and it is easy to buy with them articles of vastly more real value, like ivory rings, etc.

The Kabinda negroes wear a little brown shell, very much like our Linnæus, on their necks. The shells are sealed with wax, and are made, perhaps, vessels containing magic medicines. The large snail shells found in the Cassava or manioc fields on the Kuilu Niadi are also M'kissi, and set in the fields by the women who till them to protect the plantations. One of the chiefs in the Upper Kuilu Niadi, in N'kuangita, has a M'kissi against the tornado. It is an antelope horn. On the approach of a storm the King calls his people together; the horn is stuck in the ground and a dance is begun around it, which is kept up, in spite of wind and storm, till the tornado is over.

Every house in the village has its M'kissi; they are frequently put over the door or brought inside, and then they protect the house from fire and robbery. These penates of the negroes are sometimes figures very artistically cut in wood or ivory, and show a certain degree of native skill and taste in the people. But it is not the guardians of his house only that the negro thus represents in material figures. He also gives corporal form to diseases like small-pox and fever. Every town has its war fetich.

The hypœne palm tree on the Kuilu shows how the negro sees a spirit at work in the wonders of nature which he can not explain. The tree was M'kissi to the whole village. Good medicines, with which the negroes are acquainted or of which they experience the salutary effect, are also called M'kissi. A negro called a dose of castor oil which I gave him M'kissi m'bote, or good medicine.—N. Y. Journal.

The Humor of Sunset Cox.

"I was Chairman of the Committee of the whole during the Forty-eighth Congress," Mr. Cox lately said, "when we had two 'characters' in the House, one on each side of the chamber. One was White, of Kentucky, a man of fair ability, but an undoubted crank, and the other was the remarkably loquacious and vivacious Iowa man who was known as 'Calamity Weller.' One day these two men had taken up the time of the House in a vigorous and irrelevant debate on opposite sides of a certain motion. The House was laughing at them, and the question was ordered to be taken by the tellers. I called the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. White, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Weller, to act as tellers, and as the two approached each other in front of the Speaker it was like the meeting of two intellectual Dromios. The House grasped the situation, and the roar of laughter sounded like the howling of Barnum's menagerie. Speaker Carlisle heard the noise in his private room, and he rushed into the House with his eyes protruding, and was about to assume the gavel to restore order. A moment later, however, he learned the facts, and saw that the procedure was regular, and that the socalled fun was rather accidental than intentional. It was the only thing that could have been done under the circumstances, as the two were the champions of the opposides sides of the question at issue. In this case I got the credit for being humorous, where, indeed, I could not have acted otherwise.

"At another time, while I was in the chair," continued Mr. Cox, "Gen. Steele, of Indiana, had the floor for an hour on a favorite measure. He was parceling out his time, as is the custom, giving certain members a few minutes, and endeavoring to preserve the last few minutes for himself. He had, however, given out all but a quarter of a minute, and he asked that this might be left for him. He neglected, however, to claim the floor at the proper time, and he lost his quarter of a minute. His measure was called up without the previous question, and he was thus placed in coventry. He rose in great indignation and cried, shaking his fist at me:

"'Mr. Chairman, what has become of my quarter of a minute?'

"To this I replied, 'It has gone to the rearward and abysm of time!' Here the House laughed lustily, but it was not my fault that the situation was a humorous one. I stated a plain matter of fact. Gen. Steele, however, was not satisfied with losing his quarter of a minute. He nursed his wrath and kept it warm until the end of the session, when I had the floor on some critical bill and was persuasively asking for more time. Then came Gen. Steele's opportunity. He claimed the floor and offered to hand over to me the quarter of a minute which he said I had once stolen from him. Of course the House roared, and I got the credit for being funny, when it was, in fact, Gen. Steele.

"As to the funny things which have happened during the time I have been in the chair this session they were not intentional. At one time, when the House was being counted, I made the routine inquiry: 'As many as are in favor of the proposition will rise and stand until they are counted.' No one rose. I then announced: "Affirmative, none,' and followed with the formula required, which states: 'Yeas will be seated and the nays rise.' There were no yeas, and the Irish bull was at once caught up by Collins, of Massachusetts, and O'Ferral, of Virginia, and several other Irishmen, who are always ready with their lariat to lasso the Celtic bovine when he is loose.

"At another time, while I was acting as Speaker, I committed what might be called an unpardonable bull. It was during a time of great confusion on the floor, and I exclaimed: 'If the gentleman from Missouri would be heard he must suspend!' But I had no intention of setting the House in a roar, and I suppose my mistakes come from my Celtic extraction, which is certified to by my middle name of Sullivan, of which I am proud."

"Mamma," said a beautiful K street maiden in tender tones one morning at breakfast, "Harry is coming around to-morrow night."

"Well, what of that?" said mamma, with ill-concealed disappointment. "He's been coming every Sunday night for two years."

"Very true, mamma; but neither of them was leap year," and a cold, hard, determined look spread over her lovely features an inch and a half thick.

"Is your father a Christian?" asked the new minister. "No," replied the boy, "he sings in the choir."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Old Bill Stevens.

Something put Bateman in mind of old Bill Stevens, a sort of happy-go-lucky Rip Van Winkle, who, like Rip, was not unfamiliur with mountains, having passed a good deal of time in the wilds of the Alleghenies in the chase of bear and deer, before he came West to Michigan and settled in Oakland county, and where, perhaps, he imbibed his love for good liquor, a fondness for a roaming, vagabond life, and took on a strong tinge of superstitious feeling that seems inseparable from lonely mountain life.

"Old Bill had a niece by the name of Liddy," related Bateman, "who was as full of mischief as a pet coon, and always inventing something to take a rise out of her uncle. Old Bill was stopping around then with his relatives and others, now and then working, drinking whiskey, hunting and loafing. One night Bill was stopping at his sister's, Liddy's mother, and had made up a trip to Detroit the next day. Everybody had gone to bed except Liddy, who was chering around the house, when Old Bill started to bed. 'Now Liddy,' says he, I've got to git to Novi Corners in time for that first train, so be sure and wake me up airly, Liddy.'

"'All right,' Liddy says, 'I'll have you up at five.'

"As soon as old Bill got to bed and took to snoring, Liddy got a cold spread on the table, flopped the hands of the clock around to 5 o'clock, and roused old Bill up.

"'Just five," says Liddy, as old Bill came out rubbing his eyes. He sat down to the table, made a jab at the victuals, but soon dropped his knife and fork, and, says he, 'Getting up so airly takes away my appetite.'

"'Well, uncle,' says Liddy, 'I believe I'll lay down for awhile; I've been up late,' and so she went to bed. Old bill sat around for a spell and then went out to take a look at the east for daybreak, and then went in again. About 6 he went out again, and no signs of daybreak. At 7 it was dark. Dark as thunder at 8 and pitch dark at 9. From being mighty uneasy Bill's hair began to stand on end. At 9 o'clock he ran for his brother-in-law's room, hollering: "Wake up, wake up, George; eternal night's here and judgment day is coming.'"

"Old Bill always, when loafing, carried an old musket aronnd on his shoulder. One day Bill started down to Novi Corners to stock up on ammunition; but before he went Liddy got hold of the musket, put in a charge of powder and a short piece of punk, then another charge and another piece of punk. She lighted the last piece. Just before Bill got to Novi he met an old crony in the road, and as they went gossiping, bang! went the gun and kicked the crony in the breast.

"'Don't you do that again, Bill Stevens,' says the crony.

"'Pon my soul I didn't do it. An' I don't see how the durn thing came to go off, unless I was foolin' round the muzzle with my pipe.'

"Shouldering it again, Bil and the other fellow started for the grief shop at the corners, spent some time there, and came out. They stood in the road again talking over old times at the east, and just as Bill was turning to go, bang! went the gun again.

"'D—n the thing!' says Bill, 'there was only one load in it when I left home.'

"And he laid the musket down in the road and went home without it. His crony looked after him suspiciously, shook his head, looked out of the corner of his eye at the gun, and hurried away from it."—Detroit Evening News.

A Lincoln Story.

As too much cannot be said about Mr. Lincoln I am induced to send you the following account of an interview which the writer had with him.

I called upon him to ask for a position in the service for my son. Alas! I received it, my boy went to the war and never returned. I was accompanied by a lady companion, a Southern woman, and we had with us a little boy, a grandson of Lord Fairfax. After a pleasant interview, my friend said: "Will you give me your autograph for a friend in England?" I, however, had hesitated to ask him, although wanting one very much. He went to his desk and wrote, "Yours truly, A Lincoln," but instead of giving it to my friend, who had asked for it, he handed it to me, and I still have it among my treasures. He then wrote simply, "A Lincoln." Handing it to my friend he remarked, sotto voce; "That is good enough for England."

I then said: "Mr. President, I have brought a grandson of Lord Fairfax to see you." He was a beautiful boy and Mr. Lincoln, who was always fond of children, extended his hand to him, saying: "He bids fair to be a handsomer man than I am. Well! my little man, you are for the Union?" The boy looked up into Mr. Lincoln's face and replied: "Somewhat!" Both I and my friend were horrified; she, a Southern woman, fearing we would be arrested, and I, that I would fail in getting my boy's appointment, but Mr. Lincoln only laughed and said: "I guess there are a good many somewhats."

Just as we were about to withdraw, wishing to express my thanks for his courtesy, I said: "O, Mr. Lincoln, you do not know how much I shall prize your autograph, and if you only get us out of this war it will be ever very precious." I shall never forget his earnest, careworn, yet hopeful expression of countenance as he replied: "You pray for me and I will do the best I can."

After getting into our carriage I said to the boy, who was only about seven years of age: "Why did you say you were somewhat for the Union?" He replied: "Why, mamma, is always crying and praying for the South and papa is serving Uncle Sam, and I cannot help being somewhat."

Sam Jones Denounces Gambling.

"Listen: When that girl began the giddy whirl of the dance in the ballroom that was the time to get scared. When you found your boy spending more money than he ought that was the time to get shocked.

"Sow cards and reap gamblers. I know I'm called a transcendentalist and called a puritan, but God save my family from cards and profanity, and whiskey and dances and let the world call me what it will.

"Sow parlor dances and reap ballrooms. Sow ballrooms and reap round dances and dudes and dudines. Sow dudes and dudines and reap half a thimbleful of calves'-foot jelly. [Applause and laughter renewed again and again.] I wish you would not laugh any more to-night, for I never felt so solemn in my life. For God's sake, hear me with a solemnity and earnestness worthy of the cause. But you say I say so many funnny things. If you only knew how many I have to keep back you wouldn't blame me for the few that creep out.

"Hear me, boys, girls, young ladies of Kansas City! I used to dance. I've danced many times with the girls of my town. Hear me. If I was a fair average dancing man, and I think I was, then no pure girl can go out on the floor and dance another set, [A voice, 'Hurrah.'] Young woman, if you could but follow the young man after he has seen you home, to some barroom or club and hear the discussion of your form and person and your virtue itself, you'd never lose your respect and go on a ball room floor. The dudes get mad at me in some places and talk about wanting to slap my jaws. But, I say to their credit, they know better than to slap. I'm not afraid to drop down into a hundred acres of dudes and not a thing to fight with, and all of them armed with six-shooters.

"The tendency of the nineteenth century is to dudeism. You dress a young buck out, part his hair in the middle, put on an eyeglass, give him pants which look as though his legs had been melted and poured into them, put on toothpick shoes, and every girl admires him. [Prolonged merriment.] God help you, girls, I'd rather see my daughter dead tonight than sitting in a parlor talking to a dude. [Applause.] The good Bishop of New York says the confessional shows that nineteen out of twenty girls meet their downfall in the ballroom.

"In all my observations, I never knew a poor ruined girl who didn't go to ruin through the ballroom or the theatre. * * * A woman who has lost her character has lost all, but the boy is lionized by society. If there is one deeper, blacker hell than another, it's for that man who crushes purity and virtue under his unhallowed feet. [Applause] The only thing in the world which deserves a double barrelled shot gun and a load of buckshot is such a man.

"A round dance is an anteroom to damnation. I never want to see the arm of a lecherous man around the waist of my wife or daughter. * * I ape no man. I'll be myself, be true to myself, and true to truth. All I want to do is to stand on the barrel knock the bung out and let nature cut her capers. [Applause and laughter.] I may be an idiot and a fool, but if I'm not an idiot and a fool, you'd better think of these things."

A. S. ABELL & CO., PUBLISHERS,
BALTIMORE.

A. S. ABELL. GEORGE W. ABELL.
EDWIN F. ABELL. WALTER R. ABELL.

The BALTIMORE WEEKLY SUN continues to preserve its position, maintained for many years, as a model Family Newspaper. During the past year, in order to accommodate the great variety of matter seeking admission to its columns, it has been found necessary to issue a Supplement almost every week, presenting a home newspaper unequaled for freshness and variety. Its literary features are selected with discriminating taste and with special reference to the entertainment and instruction of the family circle. Its Agricultural and Veterinary Departments, edited by specialists, have been of great value to the Farmer, while its Fashion Articles, Household Recipes, etc., have continued to be a source of weekly interest and intruction to ladies. The latest news up to the hours of publication is given in its correspondence and telegraphic dispatches, while its editorials, besides discussing current events in an impartial spirit, afford much wholesome advice and suggestion on social, economic and other topics. The proceedings of Congress, the Maryland and other Legislatures, the National Political Conventions, and the Presidential and Congressional elections are among the important features that will be promptly and copiously presented in its columns during 1888.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

The Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright. It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.

CONSTIPATION

IS called the "Father of Diseases," because there is no medium through which disease so often attacks the system as by the absorption of poisonous gases in the retention of decayed and effete matter in the stomach and bowels. It is caused by a Torpid Liver, not enough bile being excreted from the blood to produce Nature's own cathartic, and is generally accompanied with such results as

Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache,
Bad Breath, etc.

The treatment of Constipation does not consist merely in unloading the bowels. The medicine must not only act as a purgative, but be a tonic as well, and not produce after its use greater costiveness, To secure a regular habit of body without changing the diet or disorganizing the system

"My attention, after suffering with Constipation for two or three years, was called to Simmons Liver Regulator, and, having tried almost everything else, concluded to try it. I first took a wineglassful and afterwards reduced the dose to a teaspoonful, as per directions, after each meal. I found that it had done me so much good that I continued it until I took two bottles. Since then I have not experienced any difficulty. I keep it in my house and would not be without it, but have no use for it, it having cured me."—Geo. W. Sims, Ass't Clerk Superior Court, Bibb Co., Ga.

For West Virginia.

WHEELING, W. VA., Feb. 29.—The convention of business men which convened here to-day to formulate plans to attract capital and immigrants to West Virginia was the largest and most representative gathering of the kind ever witnessed in this state.

Over 1,500 delegates were present and great enthusiasm prevailed. Every county in the State was fully represented. Among the prominent men present were Hons. Stephen B. Elkins, Henry G. Davis, John E. Kenna, John Carden, F. H. Pierpont, M. V. Richards, of the Baltimore and Ohio immigrants bureau; General Manager, Wm. M. Clements and nearly every leading manufacturer railroad man, mine operator, farmer and agriculturist of the

The meeting was called to order at noon by Mr. C. B. Hart, editor of the Wheeling Intelligencer, chairman of the committee of the Chamber of Commerce, and the originator of the movement. He called to the chair Hon. J. M. McCorkle, of Charleston, Ex-Senator Comden was made permanent chairman and Hon. B. L. Butcher, secretary. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Elkins, Davis, Pierpont, Kenna and others.

The afternoon was consumed in the work of organizing the convention. To-night the proposed board of immigration an development was organized and Mr. Hart was made president, with a vice-president from each Senatorial district. In a few minutes about $3,000 were raised for the immediate prosecution of the work of the board. The sentiment is unanimous that to-day dates a new era of prosperity and developement for West Virginia.

Ex-Senator Henry G. Davis made a lengthy speech which was well received. After congratulating the delegates and the State on this meeting of representative citizens, Mr. Davis said:

"This is an age of progress, and West Virginia has too long stood in her own light in not keeping pace with the times and in allowing her sister States to outstrip and pass her in the great race of life. We want the railroads and must have them. We cannot keep on with the rest of the world. Each county in the State ought to have one or more railroads passing through it. It is a great mistake made by many people that all railroads are profitable investments to the stockholders; very few, if any of the railroads in this State are paying dividends. Some say the railroads treat the people badly, and probably they do at times; but I take it, we would rather have a railroad, with a bad management than to be without one.

The railroads in this State last year paid into the treasury in the shape of taxes $264,738, which went toward the support of the State schools and counties. The more railroads we have the less taxes the people will have to pay. With more railroads, and having abundant water power, and all the natural resources necessary to the successful working of almost every kind of manufacturing industry, our hills and valleys ought to send forth the smoke of thousands of mills and manufactories, and our manufactured products should have a name and standing all over the world.

I want to speak of the resources and advantages we have, and make a suggestion as to the best way, in my opinion, to let others know the grand opportunities they are missing in not casting their fortunes with ours. We have long needed information as to the mineral deposits of the State, which could only be obtained by a thorough geological survey. This, I am glad to state, we are in a fair way of getting. Major Powell, who is in charge of all United States geological surveys, writes me recently that he has made considerable progress with the survey of this state, and will push forward until it is accomplished.

The making of coke is comparatively new with us, but it is a large and growing industry. In quality it is equal to the best that is made, and it commands as good a price as the celebrated Connellsville make.

We have vast forests of all kinds of merchantable timber, thousands of acres of which are not only undeveloped, but undisturbed and unbroken. The varieties comprise almost every known kind of valuable timber, such as walnut, cherry, spruce, oak, chestnut, hemlock, maple and poplar. Of our iron ore, salt and petroleum I will leave others more particularly interested to speak. I became a resident of this State in 1853 and have no idea of ever changing. My home is with you, and my fortunes are identified with yours. I want here to express my appreciation of and deep gratitude for the many favors the people of the State have bestowed on me, and to say that I stand ready to do anything I can to aid in forwarding her developement and interests. Let us do all we can to let the world know where we are, what we are and what we have, and that all who come among us to aid us in putting the State where she ought to be, in the front rank, will receive a hearty welcome. Brains, energy, labor and capital can command and secure a good reward in West Virginia."

Mr. Davis was followed by Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, who was received with enthusiastic applause. The latter in his speech said:

West Virginia presents unusual opportunities and advantages to the immigrant, the mechanic, farmer, manufacturer, business man and capitalist. According to its area, West Virginia is the richest State in the Union in natural resources, particularly in coal, iron ore and timber, which furnish the basis of so much wealth, and which go so far towards making a country great and prosperous. The beautiful scenery, healthful climate, inexhaustible mines of coal and iron ore, forests of fine timber and fertile valleys need only to be understood to draw within her borders people seeking employment and homes, business men, manufacturers and capitalists desiring to make investments.

By rail West Virginia can be reached in less than one hour from Pittsburg, in two hours from Baltimore and Washington, in five hours from Philadelphia, Columbus and Cincinnati, in seven hours from New York, and in fourteen hours from Chicago. The State lies on the great highway from the Atlantic coast to the Mississippi valley. Two trunk lines of railroad pass through it from east to west. For the population on the Atlantic seaboard, reaching from Philadelphia to Richmond, the natural and best route to the west is through West Virginia. The situation makes it easy of access from all the great centres of population, and its position in relation to the whole country and its markets is central commanding and important.

West Virginia is traversad from north to suth, a distance of of 240 miles, by the great Appalachian system of mountains forming within the State two and sometimes three distinct ranges, which stretch in width from east to west across its borders for nearly two hundred miles. Never-failing springs and streams from the sides of the mountains, making the State one of the best watered in the Union. Two-thirds of the State is underlaid with coal, its area reaching in extent sixteen thousand square miles, more that that of Pennsylvania or England, while six navigable rivers flow through its borders. Mountains, hills and valleys alternate upon a surface which is fertile from the lowest valley to the highest summit. The mountains and hills, when cleared, yield abundantly the richest grasses, making grazing and dairy farms of unsurpassed excellence. The Allegany mountains will yet largely contribute the dairy products consumed on the Atlantic seaboard and for export to Europe. Within 300 miles of tidewater and 100 miles to the Ohio river, hundreds of thousands of acres of good agricultural lands in West Virginia can be bought for from $4 to $8 per acre, the timber on which will pay for the clearing and fencing. These lands are underlad with coal, which will yield from 5,000 to 6,000 tons per acre, and which will some day be worth, with transportation facilities to market, ten cents per ton royalty in the ground.

One single railway corporation—and not the largest in the country—consumes annually 1,000,000 tons of coal, costing about $3,000,000, to feed engines that draw its enormous tonnage, In West Virginia coal is cheaper at the mouth of the mines than in England. The State offers to all railroads and manufacturing interests within and contiguous to its borders the cheapest fuel in the world.

The tide of population that for three quarters of a century has moved with such persistence to the West is abating. It has broken itself against the great chain of the Rocky mountains and the Pacific coast, and is slowly but surely making its way back and setting in toward the Alleghany mountains, the South and the great Southwest. There is no longer any frontier in the West. West Virginia and the States covering the Allegany mountains down to the gulf have become the frontier. The next great step in the order of national progress and developement is the occupation of these States, the appropriation of their great forests and the opening of their mines. They can and will largely absorb our increase in population, and furnish employment, homes and business opportunities for unborn millions.

The commercial relations with the Northern States are becoming better and more closely established. The routes of transportation and travel in this country during the last 40 years have been almost entirely from east to west, This will be to some extent modified as the South comes into prominence, and takes her true industrial position in the Union. New routes will be established between the North and South to meet the demands of increasing trade and commerce. The great wealth of natural resources belonging to the South, united to free labor, makes her developement and progress certain. The time is close at hand when the South will not send away its products to be manufactured, paying not only the cost of their transportation, but a profit to the manufacturer, and the cost of transportation on the manufactured articles which its people consume. The incubus so long resting upon the South, hindering and impeding her in the march of progress, is about to be removed. The South will not only manufacture nearly everything needed for consumption within its own borners, but something more to sell to her neighbors and send abroad.

A Prize Essay by a Printer's Devil.

The souvenir dancing orders of the Albany Printing Pressmen's Union contained the following contribution from a printer's devil," which is too funny for publication in so-called comic papers; at least, they seldom have such genuine humor. It is entitled a "Prize Essay on Newspapers:

"Newspapers is called vehicles of information.

Reporters is what is called "the staff"—so many of them being "sticks." They work hard—at refreshment bars.

Proof readers is men that spoils the punctuation of compositors. They spell a word one way to-day and another way to-morrow. They think they be intelligent persons; compositors think different

Compositors is men who sets up the types—and sometimes the drinks. Compositors is very steady men when they is sober—which they seldom is when they can help it.

Editors is men what knows everything in the heavens above and the earth beneath. They is writers who doesn't write anything whatsoever. They is the biggest men you ever see.

Managers is men as takes in the tin and gives patent medicine "ads" tops of columns next to reading matter in thirty-seven columns out of thirty-two.

Proprietors an't anybody. They an't ever seen.

Printers' devils is the most important persons in a printin' office. They does the hardest work and gets the least pay.

Pressmen is—well, there wouldn't be no newspapers, no circus bills, without pressmen to print 'em.

Feeders is men what feeds on the fat of the land.

If I ever start a paper of my own I'll call it The Umbrella. Everybody will take it.

I heard the foreman tell this funny story to one of the "staff" the other day. It must have been, 'cause they both laughed. This is the story: "A gentleman was promenading the street with a little boy at his side when the little fellow cried out: 'O pa, there goes an editor! 'Hush, hush,' said the father, 'don't make sport of the poor man—God only knows what you may come to yet."

Omaha Man—Been to Southern California, eh? Beautiful climate, isn't it?

Returned Emigrant—Glorious climate.

"I am a carpenter and builder by trade, and have been thinking of going there. Houses are scarce there, I suppose?"

"Very."

"What sort of houses are in greatest demand there just now?"

"Almshouses."—Omaha World.

"CLEAR THE WAY."

The city lies in hushed repose,
The wintry night wind freshly blows,
As if to rock the cradled host
In slumber's sweet oblivion lost.
But hark! a sound, and lo! a sight
That wakes the town in dead of night.
A shriek and a glare,
A cry of despair
At the flames in their ire,
For the one word is "Fire!"
The people rush out,
And, with hurry and shout,
Press on to the light
As it brightens the night,
And spreads like a banner unfurled up on high,
A sign and a terror against the dark sky!
But hark to the clatter, than music more sweet,
Of the rolling wheels and the horses' feet!
"Out of the way—out of the way!
They come to save—now clear the way!"

A sea of faces upward turned,
One fear by every heart inurned;
By ruddy light is clearly read
On every brow the anxious dread.
A mother 'mid the bright light stands,
Her neck tight clasped by baby hands.
And through roar and hiss,
Not quite they miss
Her piteous frenzied cry;
But mounting quick on high
A hero springs,
His helm a star
Of hope, that flings
A halo far
'Mid the lurid light.
For a moment lost, then dimly seen
As it gleams on the sight,
The curling wreaths of smoke between!
Up the ladder one rushed, but three come down,
And the shining helm is a hero's crown!
Yet heeds not he what people say,
He only bids them "clear the way!"

DORIS' BABY.

A Brilliant Scheme and Its Happy Results.

Subdued joy pervaded the "Hotel Lombardia," at Florence, because it was rumored abroad that Miss Roseleaf's pug-Trotty was in extremis. He was not an attractive animal mentally or physically, and had endeared himself to no one save his lovely young mistress. His figure was ruined through overfeeding; he had lost one eye in a bygone tussle with a butcher's cat, and the other optic glared at the world with a sinister expression from out the black patch upon his countenance. Had he not mouthed Major Winkham's slipper into an unpleasant pulp, and retired under Miss Pilcherton's bed, there to snore and frighten that lady into spasms? He had also snatched a biscuit out of the hand of infant innocence—the mother of said innocence passing a sleepless night wondering if it were not well to send for Pasteur, to be quite sure that the bite was no more than biscuit.

For all these misdemeanors, Miss Roseleaf apologized with a grace so charming, that the malcontents were seen to stop on the stairs to stroke Trotty, and tell him he was a dear little fellow, so he was—the same quadruped which they had erstwhile apostrophized as a hideous, squab-legged, overfed, vicious-tempered brute.

But how could they do else than melt, with Doris Roseleaf's sweet eyes caressing them from under the shade of her big tossing-plumed hat, and the shell-pink on her cheeks deepened to a warm sunset rose at praise of her ill-favored pet!

"Yes, Doris is so foolishly fond of the dog, I'm obliged to put up with him; but he is a great nuisance, to be sure, particularly traveling. When we start for the Tyrol next week there will be the usual harrowing scene—the railway people refusing to let Trotty go in the carriage with us, Doris in tears, and at last a fee to pay, or a bribe, that really breaks my heart. We can not afford such foolish outlay. I wish something would happen to the wretched animal; he has lived quite long enough." In the above words, Mrs. Roseleaf had been wont to express her chief grievance to a mixed audience for years. Now that destiny, in the shape of cramps and a stiff neck, seemed close upon the heels of Trotty, Mrs. Roseleaf inwardly rejoiced, but maintained a hypocritical attitude of concern in the presence of her daughter

"I believe it would be well to send for a verterinary doctor; he could give poor Trotty some chloroform, or something to end his sufferings," she said to Doris, and, in an aside to a friend, added: "I grudge the expense, but it would be such a relief to have the little brute surely done for, once and for all."

A few hours later, as Mrs. Roseleaf returned from a walk, Doris met her with a radiant face, crying: "O, mamma, Trotty is so much better! going to recover and be better and stronger than ever before, the doctor says."

"What doctor?"

"Why, the vet. you said we ought to send for. I had him come while you were away, and he must be a wonderfully clever man—he has certainly saved Trotty's life. He asked fifteen francs, but I had to give him twenty, as you had nothing smaller in your purse, and I couldn't ask him for five francs change. Mamma. I don't believe that you are one bit glad that poor Trotty is better!" and tears welled over in the lovely violet eyes which worked such havoc in the mother most of all.

"Yes—yes, child, I'm very glad," the mendacious old lady answered, but her looks belied her words. "Twenty francs more paid for making the dog's life surer than before, and I believed he would be dead to-night. Ah, me! and that dreadful journey impending!" was the burden of her thoughts.

"Mama," said Doris, one morning, breaking in upon her parent's perusal of "She," "I have a brilliant idea for making the journey easy for us all. Miss Willis told me she gave her cat an opium powder once, before taking him on a thirty-six hours' journey in the train. He dozed all the time in his basket, quiet as a lamb, and the guard thought he was luncheon."

"I suppose you mean to give Trotty an opium powder, but I fear the guards can scarcely be induced to mistake him for luncheon."

"No, they will be otherwise deceived. Trotty is to be given a big powder to keep him quiet, and he is then to be dressed as a baby, laid on a pillow, and with a vail over his face is to cross the frontier. Perk shall carry him."

"Doris, do you think I would ever consent to such a preposterous idea? It isn't respectable. What would people say and think? Put such nonsense out of your head at once, I beg of you."

"Not a bit of it, mamma, dear; the idea is too excellent a one to let slip. You will be of my opinion quite, when you have allowed yourself time to reflect. The Staunton' nurse is going to lend me a pretty pillow with lace and embroidery, and one of their baby's dresses, and a cap. Your chuddah will do to wrap around his body. Tina will dress him and tie him on the pillow in quite the orthodox way. It will be great fun; Perk's face will be a treat when she hears that she has got to carry Trotty masquerading as a baby.

Poor Mrs. Roseleaf's face was clouded and sad as racing-day at Baden-Baden. She knew perfectly well that Doris would carry her point—she always yielded to the child; and what dreadful results might not follow this last escapade! But in this instance, as in thousands of others, the weak old lady decided there was nothing to do but make the best of a bad bargain, and she took a limp interest in the preparations for what seemed to be a most novel undertaking.

The night of the Roseleafs departure from the "Lombardia," a chosen few were asked into a private salon, there to inspect Trotty in his new rôle. "Admirable! he would deceive the mother of a dozen babies. Tina should have a medal for her skill."

"Keep his veil down and he will humbug everybody."

"The powder will keep him quiet for twenty hours at least."

"Rather a stout baby, but all the more comely for that."

"Let me kiss the darling; he looks sweet enough to eat!"

"With his veil down, yes."

This nature of wit flew about in subdued whispers, interspersed with much suppressed laughter, till it was time for the Roseleaf party to start for the station. The expression of Perk, a very dragon of the virtue of the British spinster order, when made to bear forth Trotty on her arms, en bebe, was never forgotten by those who remained at the "Lombardia."

"There is another blessed infant to make the night hideous for somebody," soliloquized a good-looking young Englishman, peering forth from the window of a carriage at the Florence Station.

"The train seems very full; I'm afraid we can't have a coupe to ourselves," said Mrs. Roseleaf, regretfully. "There is one compartment with only a young man in it; shall we go in there?"

"Yes," said Doris, promptly. "A man will not notice any thing odd in the conduct of my baby, and will not wish to kiss it, as some silly women might."

"By Jupiter! they are coming in here—I am an unlucky dog, and no mistake!" exclaimed Mr. Harold Lyman, the young man already mentioned.

His dismay was pardonable. He was escorting from Florence to Verona his sister's baby, the very juvenile Contessa Montefiore, as well as her stolid Abruzzi nurse; the woman to return at once to her mountains so soon as she should have laid her young charge in the arms of her successor at Verona. The baby's mother was ill of measles at Florence, and to escape infection, the little contessa was hastily dispatched to its grandfather's under the guidance of its rather scatter-brained young uncle. The baby was a brazen-lunged fiend of six months; sleeping like an angel on a laced pillow at that moment, but anon she would awake and rend the air with her yells. To escape this, Mr. Lyman had feed a perfidious guard for the adjourning coupe left vacant for him, and now behold his privacy invaded by another squalling torment. He fumed and fretted inwardly for a time, and then found some solace in watching the movements of Doris, in the light of the half-vailed lamp. She took the baby from the grim Abigail, hugged him to her breast, kissed him through his white gauze vail, and hushed him to sleep on her soft arm—the sweetest rest in the world.

"Impossible that that girl is the baby's mother," mused Mr. Lyman to himself; "and yet, why not? She is very young, but that kind of exquisitely pretty girl generally marries young. Lucky devil, her husband! It must be her baby—girls don't coddle and pet other people's offspring in that way. The old dame has 'grandmother' plainly written on her countenance and in her fussy manner, and I heard the young lady call the elder one mamma. The vinegar-visaged party is their maid, of course."

Thus Mr. Lyman mused on in a way that caused him an annoyance he could not understand. Why should he care whether his pretty traveling companion was married a dozen times or not at all? He would never see her again after that brief journey. What an extraordinary quiet baby it was! for two hours now it had not stirred or lifted up its voice, though it had been laid by itself on the seat not far from Mr. Lyman. Was it a baby at all? perhaps only a doll or a bundle. But a long sigh from the somnolent Trotty, and a slight fidgeting of his corpulent body, removed the young Englishman's dawning doubts, and caused Miss Roseleaf to redouble her attentions to her disguised pet.

Presently a violent jerk of the train threw everybody into everybody else's arms. Mr. Lyman found himself closely clasping both of Miss Roseleaf's hands, and assuring her there was not the least danger, though he knew no more than she did what was the trouble. A guard, running the length of the train, crying out some trifling cause for the sudden stop, soon restored serenity.

"How soft and tiny her hands are!" thought Lyman; "and what a fool I am to care whether another fellow's wife's hands are pretty or not!"

All through this commotion the remarkable infant uttered not a sound nor moved as much as a finger. Lyman resolved to hazard a remark that would convince him whether or not his fair companion was the mother of this stolid cherub.

"The—it—your baby is unusually good; does it never cry!" he managed to enunciate.

His charming neighbor's face broke into smiles. Lyman's face fell—yes, only a mother could look so radiant at praise of her darling.

"Yes, he is very good," the young lady said, with a blush.

Mrs. Lyman somehow did not seem to feel a desire to pursue the conversation which the mishap to the train had started, and he soon sank quietly back into his corner.

"Mamma," said Doris, in an undertone, "I think I will tell this young man about Trotty; he seems very nice, and would enjoy the joke."

"I beg of you do nothing of the sort. What kind of low adventuresses would he take us for?"

Certainly a very new order of adventuress Mrs. Roseleaf would be, and poor Perk was certainly free from the imputation in appearance.

"Perhaps he is connected with the railway and custom-house in some way, and might have us all arrested," continued the elder lady.

Doris decided it was perhaps best to keep her own counsel, and she settled back for a reverie in her corner, with her hand laid caressingly on Trotty's fat back.

What a good-looking, intelligent, humorous fellow he seemed—her vis-a-vis! How she would like to know him, and lead him back an adoring slave to flaunt before the envious girls at the "Lombardia!" One met such men only in books and on fleeting journeys, where one lost them again forever at the first big station. This phase of life was really very hard.

Early dawn at Verona; here the silly boy and girl who had traveled ten hours together took leave of each other forever, they supposed, and both looked grieved out of all proportion to the occasion. Mr. Lyman saw his little niece and her nurse installed by the door of the waiting-room, and then went out on the platform to fume and fret because the Montefiore carriage had not come.

"That baby looks about the age of ours," said Doris to her mother, designating the little contessa, of whose existence she had heard nothing from its uncle. Ecru gauze vails are evidently the proper thing, too. Perk, we will put Trotty on the bench on the other side of the door, beside that very safe-looking old dame who is half asleep, and then I want you to come with me to the toilet-room to mend the flounce I tore getting out of the train. Mamma will keep an eye on Trotty."

Alas! "mamma's" eyes saw only the land of dreams while her daughter and maid were absent.

The baby contessa becoming particularly fretful, the nurse bethought herself of a possible pin, or too tight string, and carried the baby off to Toilet-room No. 2, to investigate.

At this juncture the Montefiore arrige drove up in a tremendous hurry. There was not a moment to lose. The Signor Conte had been telegraphed for to go to his son, who was very ill, and it was only by a miracle that they had wrung out the time to come for the contessina. The Signor Conte must have the carriage in twenty minutes without fail.

"Go," said Mr. Lyman to the footman, "and take the baby from the nurse; she is waiting at the door. You need have no words with her, as she has been paid and dismissed. Make haste, and don't wake the child."

To the great disgust of the affectionate uncle, the new nurse had not been able to come in the carriage for the baby, and she must have a tete-a-tete drive with it. Fortunately, it was not far. While the footman gone for the baby, he busied himself making a bed of shawls in the carriage big enough for the infant's grandfather to repose comfortably on. "There, I hope that will sleep," he said, giving his work a final pat.

The footman dashed into the waiting-room, cast a hasty, comprehensive glance about, and then gathered up the unconscious Trotty as the only infant in the room. He quietly withdrew him from a partially overhanging draperies of the old woman at his side, whom he took for the nurse. "Madonna mia! what a fright the old girl will have when she finds the baby gone! It serves her right though; she ought not to go to sleep at her post, and I have no time for explanations."

Mrs. Roseleaf, on the bench opposite, continued to sleep the sleep of the just, and Trotty was borne away.

"Asleep, Carlino? That is lucky. Put her down gingerly, my boy, on these shawls. All right. Avanti!" and the count's carriage dashed forward.

Before the rattle of its wheels died away there began an animated scene in the waiting-room at Verona. Doris, her toilet adjusted, sought out the cozy nest where she had left her pet, but to her horror, the bird was flown. Then arose tears and lamentations which would have melted granite. Where was he, her darling her beauty! She did not care if the whole world knew he was a dog—only let someone return him, and he should have any reward he asked for. Somebody testified to having seen a footman, in livery, come in and take away the baby or dog, or whatever it was. "A case of abduction, then, and more hopeless than ever!" wailed Doris. The imperturbable Abruzzi nurse, with her baby sleeping sweetly as angel, blinked stupidly at the excited people around her, understanding or caring nothing about their evident distress. She only wondered vaguely why the Signor Comte's carriage was so slow in coming.

Presently Harold Lyman, with a face as white as a ghost, dashed into the room. He carried a lace handkerchief in his hand, and went straight up to the weeping Doris, saying: "Madam, is this your property? I believe it is, for I noticed the same on your portmanteau in the train."

"Yes, it is mine. It was round my darling Trotty's neck. Is he still alive? Pray, pray don't tell me he is dead!"

"Very much alive, my dear young lady, and I am here to beg you to come and claim him. He is quite too much for any of us to manage." Then turning to the nurse and baby on whom his eyes had rested for a moment with intense relief as he entered the room, he said to the woman, with flashing eyes, "How dare you disobey me and go wandering off and losing yourself at the most important moment? Your stupidity has nearly been the death of us all. The other nurse has gone into fits, and if she dies her blood will be on your soul!"

"It was a pin, Eccellenz," the woman replied, unmoved.

Five minutes later, Mrs. Roseleaf, Doris, Mr. Lyman and the real baby were packed into a carriage and were spinning along to the Palazzo to which Trotty had been conveyed.

Never in all her life will Doris forget the aspect of things as she was ushered into the presence of her lost darling. It was a large, airy room, like a nursery. Trotty, considerably recovered from his opium drowsiness, stood on the floor in extreme negligé, barking furiously at a dozen or more of frightened people, any one of whom would rather grasp hot coals than touch him. His cap was rakishly careened to one side, he had torn his lace dress fore and aft, and his shawl trailed sideways on the carpet.

"Santissima Madonna! that black imp sent to me instead of the dear contessina! Anima nera! the witches are at work this night!" groaned the nurse on her knees in a corner, telling her beads with such fervor that the rosary had snapped twice.

"You ought to have heard her shriek when she lifted up the veil and that one evil eye blinked at her. 'It's the devil himself,' she yelled, and flopped in a faint on the floor."

"Trotty, dear Trotty!" cried Doris, rushing forward.

Benignity and pleasure softened Trotty's sinister eye; slowly his tattered draperies swayed to and fro with the beatific wagging of his tail. He started towards his mistress, but tripped ignobly in his petticoat and rolled over. "You darling, you shall not be a baby any more!" and she tore off the garments so much the worse for wear, and allowed Trotty to appear in the dignity of his own coat.

This interview, very painful for all persons concerned, safe one, was ended as soon as possible, and the Roseleafs were driven back to the station, there to begin their usual pleading with the guards, to allow their dog to accompany them.

Before bidding them adieu, Mr. Lyman managed with considerable finesse to find out where Mrs. Roseleaf and her daughter were going to spend she next six weeks.

Oddly enough, he appeared, quite by chance of course, at the same place a fortnight later, and somehow found it necessary and expedient to go to the resort next selected by them.

It so turned out that when Doris returned in the autumn to the "Lombardia" she did have a handsome admirer to flaunt in the faces of the other girls.

"He is wonderfully devoted. When is the wedding to be?"

"In May, Mrs. Roseleaf told me. She is heart-broken at the idea of losing Doris, but it is the only way she can be rid of Trotty—and this thought consoles her."—Rachel Carew, in Leslie's Weekly.

When the parents have eyes of different colors, the chances are fifty-five to forty-five in favor of brown as against blue or gray eyes in the children. He is also of opinion that the health of the brunette type is, as a rule, superior to that of the blonde type.

March April May

Are the months in which to purify the blood, for at no other season is the body so susceptible to benefit from medicine. The peculiar purifying and reviving qualities of Hood's Sarsaparilla are just what are needed to expel disease and fortify the system against the debilitating effects of mild weather. Every year increases the popularity of Hood's Sarsaparilla, for it is just what people need at this season. It is the ideal spring medicine. If you have never tried it, do so.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

"For many months I suffered greatly. My whole system seems to be entirely run down, my ambition was gone, I had pains in my back, and a feeling of lassitude which I could not throw off. I was treated unsuccessfully for kidney trouble. I determined to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. Before the first bottle was taken I can candidly say I was relieved. I have used the medicine off and on ever since, and recommend it for kidney or liver complaints." MRS. W. H. STRANG, 937 Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is prepared from Sarsaparilla, Dandelion, Mandrake, Dock, Juniper Berries, and other well known vegetable remedies, in such a peculiar manner as to derive the full medicinal value of each. It will cure, when in the power of medicine, scrofula, salt rheum, sores, boils, pimples, all humors, dyspepsia, biliousness, sick headache, indigestion, general debility, catarrh, rheumatism, kidney and liver complaints. It overcomes that extreme tired feeling and

Purifies the Blood

"Seven years ago, while my little boy was playing in the yard, he was bitten by a spider. The poison entered his blood, and sores soon broke out about his body. Several times we succeeded in healing the sores up, but in spite of all we could do they would soon break out again. Finally we tried Hood's Sarsaparilla, and he took one bottle and one-third of another, when the sores disappeared. He has not a sore spot on him now, and I consider him perfectly cured." WM. H. B. WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Disease, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

A rare gift for the ladies. Save much money and secure the best! Every lady knows and appreciates the privilege of having a few remnants of ribbon, handy for the thousand and one tasty and useful purposes for which such goods are used, and which they, the ladies, have no such advantage. To purchase what is wanted at the usual prices such goods are sold for, would cause a large bill of expense, and therefore debars a great many from indulging their tastes in this direction. Realizing that there were thousands upon thousands of remnants of ribbons among the large importing houses of America which they would be willing to dispose of in bulk, for a small fraction of their cost, to any one capable of purchasing largely, we instituted a search, resulting in our obtaining the entire stock of Silk and Satin Ribbon Remnants of several of the largest of these houses, who imported the finest goods. These goods may be depended upon as superior to anything to be found, except in the very best stores of America. Yet they are given away free; nothing like it ever known. A grand benefit for all the ladies; beautiful, elegant, choice goods absolutely Free. We have expended thousands of dollars in this direction, and can offer an immensely, varied, and most complete assortment of ribbons, in every conceivable shade and width, and all of excellent quality, adapted for neck-wear, bonnet strings, hat trimmings, bows, scarfs, dress trimmings, silk quilt work, etc., etc. Some of these remnants range three yards and upwards in length. Though remnants, all the patterns are new and late styles, and may be depended on as beautiful, refined, fashionable and elegant. How to get a box containing a Complete Assortment of these elegant ribbons Free. The Practical Housekeeper and Ladies' Fireside Companion, published monthly by us, is acknowledged, by those competent to judge, to be the best periodical of the kind in the world. Very large and handsomely illustrated; regular price 75 cts. per year; send 25 cents and we will send it to you for a trial year, and will also send free a box of the ribbons; 2 subscriptions and 2 boxes, 65 cts.; 4 subscriptions and 4 boxes, $1. One-cent postage stamps may be sent for less than $1. Get 3 friends to join you thereby getting 4 subscriptions and 4 boxes for only $1; can do it in a few minutes. The above offer is based on this fact:—those who read the periodical referred to, for one year, want it thereafter, and pay us the full price for it; it is in after years, and not now, that we make money. We make this great offer in order to at once secure 250,000 new subscribers, who, not now, but next year, and in years thereafter, shall reward us with a profit, because the majority of them will wish to renew their subscriptions, and will do so. The money required is but a small fraction of the price you would have to pay at any store for a much smaller assortment of far inferior ribbons. Best bargain ever known; you will not fully appreciate it until after you see the Safe delivery guaranteed. Money refunded to any one not perfectly satisfied. HER EXPLANATION.

"Had, too!"
"Hadn't, neither!"
So contended Bess and May—
Neighbor children who were boasting
Of their grandmammas, one day.

"Had, too!"
"Hadn't, neither!"
All the difference begun;
By May's saying she'd two grandmas,
While poor Bess had only one.

"Had, too!"
"Hadn't, neither!"
Tossing curls, and kinks of friz,
"How could you have two grandmothers
When just one is all they is?"
"Had, too!"
"Hadn't, neither!
'Cause ef you had two," said Bess,
"You'd displain it!" Then May answered:
"My grandmas were twins, I guess!"

FIFTY CENTS FOR A MARBLE.

How Roy Was Reminded to Stand by Fair and Honest Dealings.

"Don't put your fingers in the dish, dear, and don't pick at the cake," said Roy's mother.

"Don't take an apple without leave from a tree belonging to any one else."

Roy was a good little boy in most things, but he took no pains to correct himself of this habit of picking up and pilfering in a small way. And as a bad habit, like a great many other bad things—and good ones, too—grows very fast, it was not long before he would take an orange or half a dozen macaroons from a dish waiting for dessert; and if a marble or a pencil belonging to another boy came in his way, he would slip it into his pocket if he was quite sure that nobody would see him. His mother some times came to know of his ugly tricks, and talked to him of the sin and meanness of taking any thing belonging to another.

"Will you go down town and get some Berlin wool for me, Roy?" asked grandmother, coming into the room.

"Yes, ma'am," says Roy.

"That's one of the things your hands can do," said mamma, as he took up the half-dollar and the bit of paper on which grandmother wrote the errand, although he insisted he could remember it without writing.

"Two ounces like sample," said the man at the store. "Yes, that's right," as Roy laid down the money. "It's twenty-five cents an ounce."

The man put the wool in a paper bag, which he shoved toward Roy, and then turned to wait on another customer.

Roy began looking at the marbles which stood in little round wooden boxes on the counter. He had never seen so many in his life before. There were commies, chinies and potteries and brandies and crystals and agates, and if there is any other kind of marble, it was there, too. They were all colors of the rainbow, plain and streaked and shaded and spotted. He felt almost like buying some of them. But he had been for weeks saving up his half-dollar to buy a fishing rod, which he could not do without; for he was going home with grandmother, and they always fished there. He began to think it was very unfair that Mr. Pike, the store-keeper, should have so many marbles and he so few. He took one out to look at. What a beauty it was with its red and white stripes, with a delicate twist of blue inside! His paper-bag of wool lay near as he gave the marble a soft roll on the counter. The paper had become unfolded and the marble rolled toward it. With another little touch it actually rolled in—all of itself! Roy was sure it was none of his doing. He glanced quickly to see if Mr. Pike was looking; but no, he was still busy with somebody else. There was such lots of marbles. Roy said to himself: "What harm could it do to let it stay in the bag, as it would roll there? Just one, when Mr. Pike had so many." He had never taken any thing from a store before, and his fingers—the fingers, alas! which his mother thought good for so much better work—trembled as he began folding up the opening of the bag.

"Let me see," said Mr. Pike, turning suddenly towards him. "I wonder if I got the right weight on that wool? It was two ounces, wasn't it?"

"Ye-es, sir," stammered Roy. His face turned red, and he felt hot down to his feet as Mr. Pike took the bag from his hand.

"Why, I have made a mistake," said Mr. Pike, putting it on the scales. "Sure as the world, I've given you four ounces, I must take some out."

"Oh, no!" said Roy, in great fright, taking hold of the bag.

How could he bear to see that marble found there? In a moment it flashed upon him that by paying for the extra two ounces he could prevent it.

"I—I believe grandmother would just as lief have four ounces," he said. He took his own half-dollar and offered it to Mr. Pike.

"That'll be all right," said Mr. Pike, dropping Roy's half-dollar in his change drawer. The poor naughty little boy set his lips tightly together as he went out of the store, carrying his paper bag. His half-dollar was gone, and with it his fishing-rod—the beautiful bamboo rod with which he had expected to astonish all the little country boys, who had nothing but saplings cut in the woods. He took out the marble and looked at it as he walked home. It was a finer one than any one of Johnny Pringle's, there was no mistake about that; but he had paid a half-dollar for it, and he knew it was worth just about five cents. He could not bear to look at it. He carried the wool to grandmother and then went and hid the crystal in an old box of rubbish standing in the farthest corner of the tool-house.

"Hi, there!" called a voice to Roy, a few days afterward. Roy was walking along the street, having just taken a sorrowful look at the window inside of which were the fishing-rods, and settled on one he would have bought, if he could have bought any. It was Mr. Pike who called, and Roy went toward him with cheeks again turning red, and wondering as he had wondered the hundredth times, if Mr. Pike knew.

"Here's your half-dollar," said Mr. Pike. "Did you think I meant to make you pay it for one marble?"

Roy hung his head and held back his hands.

"Take it," said Mr. Pike, grasping the small hand and putting the coin into it. "But let me tell you, my little man," he added in a more serious tone, "you'd better face right about in this matter of being sneaky and deceitful. You've got a long life ahead of you, and if you go through it paying away truth and honor and manliness for every trifle you want, it will be a much worse bargain than paying fifty cents for a marble."

"I'll remember, sir, and thank you," said Roy, in a very humble tone. "I'll run and bring back the marble."

"No," said Mr. Pike. "You can keep it."

"But I hate the very sight of it," said Roy.

"Never mind that. Put it among your other marbles, and play with it. Don't trade it nor give it away, but let it always remind you to stand by fair and honest dealings as long as you live."

It was a good lesson for Roy; and I hope he profited by it, don't you?—Golden Days.

How Us Children Made Molasses Candy—What Mamma Says.

"We wanted to make some molasses candy. Mamma didn't like to let us, for Bridget was out, and there was no one to see to us, so she was afraid we'd burn ourselves; but we coaxed, and she says she hates to say no to us little ones.

"She told me to take a saucepan and fill it half full of molasses. I thought it ought to be fuller than that, so I put it almost full.

"Papa had given us ten cents to buy some peanuts to put in the candy; so I put the molasses on the stove, and we all sat down to shell the peanuts.

"When we were most done, I heard some thing go siz-z-z-z, very loud, and we all jumped up, and it was the molasses boiling over. It was all over the stove. I was scared, but I took the long handle of the saucepan and carried it to the table. Then it didn't boil over any more, but it spilled all the way, and we all stepped in it, and it was very sticky.

"And when we walked about the floor, that was very sticky, too. And there was a dreadful smell and a dreadful smoke.

"Mamma came down to see, and she saw, and she looked with her hands up. She said she couldn't leave the baby again, and we must be careful and keep the molasses on the back of the stove. Then it didn't boil over any more.

"When we all jumped up, the peanuts all fell down. When we picked them up, they were all sticky. The shells stuck to the nuts, but Tom said they wouldn't show in the candy.

"We put the peanuts in, and tasted to see if it was done; but it burned us, and we all cried.

"I took some in a saucer to ask mamma if it was done. I spilled it in the hall and on the stairs, but it was so dark there it didn't show at all. Mamma said it wasn't done, so we boiled it some more.

"Then I got the big meat dish and poured it all in. We set it out-doors to cool. We knew when it was cool, for Rover came and licked it before we could drive him away.

"It was very hard and it wouldn't come off the dish. Mamma had told me to put some butter on the dish first, but I forgot it. I put some on then, but it didn't do a bit of good.

"At last Tom got the hammer and hammered it. Then it broke all to pieces. The dish broke, too.

"When we got the candy off the pieces, we worked it to get it white. I dropped mine in the wood-box and got some little chips on it. They wouldn't come off, but when I went on working it, they didn't show any. Tom made a long string with his, and jumped the rope with it.

"The candy didn't get very white. When we were all tired of working it, I went to papa's desk to get some nice white paper to put it on. I went to ask sister Laura for some thread, but she was out, so I hunted in her work-basket and got it myself. I tied up some little parcels of the candy.

"Then we took some to mamma and grandmother, and they were very much obliged to us, indeed, but said they wouldn't take it from us.

"Tom has had to have his hair cut very short. Elsie cries every time her hair is combed.

"Grandmother says she can't step anywhere in the house but what it's sticky. Papa says all the paper in his desk is sticky. Sister Laura says all the thread in her basket is sticky. Bridget says every thing everywhere is sticky.

"Mamma says we had better not make any more molasses candy for a long time."—Youth's Companion.

—"What are you reading, Miss Wabash?" asked Miss Pittsburgh, who was visiting in Chicago. "I have had an hour's communication with Emerson, through the medium of his essays," replied Miss Wabash. "Do you like Emerson?" "Well, r-ow, you're shouting!"—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—It is claimed that of all food linseed and cottonseed meal make the richest manure.

—In the North alfalfa should not be sown much earlier than corn-planting time, as it sprouts in a few days and the tender plants are liable to be killed by frost.

—The fumes of burning coffee are a powerful disinfectant. Pound the coffee in a mortar, and then strew it on a hot iron plate, which, however, must not be red hot.

—It may be accepted as a truism that if a man keeps his little garden and yard neat, trim and fruitful, he is a steady, industrious and useful member of the community.

—Cream Crullers: One cup of sugar, one tablespoonful of butter, one cup of thick cream, teaspoon of soda and teaspoon of ground cinnamon. Mix with flour to a very soft dough, roll, cut out and fry brown.

—Let the dinner seldom be without horseradish, which is none the worse for being mixed with grated turnip. Raw turnip, grated with vinegar, is a relish with bread and butter, very wholesome, and, like chopped fresh cabbage, much more digestible than cooked.

—There are breeds of fowls that fatten more readily than others, the same as among animals, and must be fed cautiously, or they will become too fat to lay. Among them may be mentioned the Brahmas, Cochins, Plymouth Rocks and Langshans. In feeding such fowls corn should not be made an exclusive diet.

—"Apples never sweat," says the Popular Science News, "but the moisture is due to condensation of moisture from without. It would be better if this condensation could be avoided, as dryness of fruit is essential to its protracted keeping, but it is impossible. Apples picked on a moderately cool day and placed in a moderately cool shed, protected from the sun, will not gather moisture, and this is the best method to pursue when practicable."

FIRST-CLASS MUTTON.

Valuable Points for Producers as Well as Consumers.

The breed of sheep that yields the most savory mutton is the Welsh mountain sheep. It roams at large over the hill and lowland of its native vales very like the American deer prior to the advent of civilization; hence the venisonish flavor of its flesh, caused by the quality of its food and the nature of its environments. The legs are very small, scarcely ever reaching ten pounds, and are sold at the fancy grocers' shops at two or three times the price of ordinary mutton. A recollection of the tender sweetness of one of these Welsh legs is apt to give a higher appreciation of these small sheep than might be profitable for a farmer to entertain. The other mountain breed of sheep, such as the Cheviot, Scotch black-faced and the Rocky Mountain Argali, yield flesh very like the Welsh mutton, but of a coarser character, and proportionately less juicy and sweet. The best quality of mutton in the United States is found in the carcass of the pure bred Southdown. Their mutton is of the best of flavor, caused chiefly by the excellent character of their pasture, and being bred in line for nearly half a century, these excellent qualities have become a characteristic peculiarity of the breed.

No one breed of sheep combines the highest perfection in all the points which give value to this race of animals. One is remarkable for weight, or early maturity, or excellent quality of its carcass, while it is deficient in quantity or quality of wool; one is hardy, small and wild, while another may be tender and quite domestic; and another which is valuable for wool is comparatively deficient in carcass. Some breeds will flourish only under certain conditions of feed and climate, while others are much less affected by those conditions, and will subsist under the greatest variations of temperature and on the most opposite qualities of verdure.

That the quality of any flesh depends greatly upon the manner of its dressing I am certain. The quality of the flesh of the rabbit is fifty per cent. better if dressed immediately after being killed. The flesh of the prairie chicken, as eaten in Chicago, is unpalatable, while it is the best of flesh when dressed properly immediately after being killed. "Woolly mutton," as it is called, is superior to the "city-market" rabbit or prairie chicken. "Woolly-mutton" is not caused by the flesh coming in contact with the wool, as many erroneously suppose. The disagreeable flavor is imparted to the meat by age, by bad feeding, or no feeding at all, and by delay in removing the viscera.

Let a sheep be properly managed from birth to butchering, and the entrails taken out with neatness and dispatch, and the carcass can be wrapped in the yolkiest, wrinkliest skin without detriment, barring the uncleanliness. The moment the last drop of blood is shed, the entrails begin to emit a gas which permeates the flesh and causes the "sheepy or woolly" smell and taste. To avoid this the entrails should be removed before taking off the pelt, or the pelt must be taken off quickly. I have practiced, and find it satisfactory, the following mode of dressing a mutton: I sever the head with a cleaver, open the pelt at the hind legs, insert the gambrel and hang immediately. An opening is made and a pail of cold water is poured in, which arrests this gas and cools the entrails. The pelt is removed, after which the water is let out by making a small opening near the point of the breast-bone, after which the mutton is entrailed. A clean cloth should be used to remove blood-stains rather than water.—Breeders' Gazette.

Patti's Paste Diamonds.

That paste now equals to all ornamental purposes the true gem was proven when Patti was here last. Her diamonds interested the society ladies as much as her voice. The "O's" and "ahs" created a soft breeze through the whole house when she appeared in the famous necklace streaming like doubled and redoubled rivers of fire around her beautiful neck. But it wasn't the original necklace at all! There is no telling how much the receipts at the box office would have fallen off if the dear public had known that it and all the rest of the Patti diamonds displayed for their delectation were nothing but paste duplicates. The originals were lying cozily in a safety deposit vault in London. Patti had a pair of diamond earrings and a pin and a couple of rings with her; that was all. All the paste were, however, exact duplicates of diamonds in her possession, if that is any comfort.—N. Y. Graphic.

A Tremendous Sensation

would have been created one hundred years ago by the sight of one of our modern express trains whizzing along at the rate of sixty miles an hour. Just think how our grandfathers would have stared at such a spectacle! It takes a good deal to astonish people now-a-days, but some of the marvelous cures of consumption, wrought by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, have caused a wide-spread amazement. Consumption is the last acknowledged curable. The "Golden Medical Discovery" is the only remedy for it. If taken at the right time Each, bear in mind, is not when the lungs are nearly gone—it will go right to the seat of the disease and accomplish its work as nothing else in the world can.

There is but one safe and sure way to change all this for the better. The ladies should use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

"Give Him $2, and Let Him Guess."

We once heard a man complain of feeling badly, and wondered what ailed him. A humorous friend said, "Give a doctor $2, and let him guess." It was a cutting satire on some doctors, who don't always guess right. You need not guess what ails you when your food don't digest, when your bowels and stomach are inactive, and when your head aches every day, and you are languid and easily fatigued. You are bilious, and Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets will bring you out all right. Small, sugar-coated, easy to take. Of druggists.

Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC,
—THE—
Great Spring Medicine.

THE BEST REMEDY FOR THE NERVES.

For nervous and physical exhaustion, weak, tired and languid feelings, with no power or ambition for exertion, it is the very best remedy and an absolute cure. In cases of sleeplessness, wakefulness and nervous irritability its use will be followed by calm repose and natural, refreshing sleep. For nervousness, nervous debility, despondency and depression of the mind it is a perfect specific, and its effects wonderful. For neuralgia, rheumatism, paralysis, numbness, trembling and insanity, it is the only recognized sure cure. It never fails to cure nervous and sick headache, palpitation of the heart, apoplexy, epileptic fits, hysteria, St. Vitus's Dance.

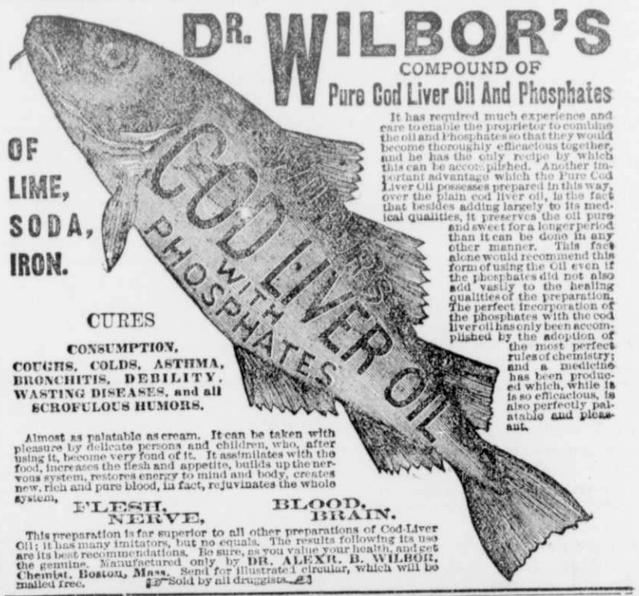
THE BEST SPRING TONIC FOR THE BLOOD.

In the spring the blood requires a remedy which is cleansing, purifying, and at the same time strengthening and invigorating. Not only the sick, but those who call themselves well, should keep well by not neglecting this important duty. A few bottles of Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC, which is purely vegetable, will remove the languid, listless and weakened feelings due to spring, and restore the vitality, vigor and energies.

THE BEST STOMACH AND LIVER MEDICINE.

Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC has no equal in the cure of dyspepsia, indigestion, loss of appetite, bad taste in the mouth mornings, constipation, biliousness, torpid liver, belching of wind, fulness and distress at pit of stomach, pain in side and under shoulder, headache and dizziness. In the spring all the organs become torpid and inactive, and require the gentle yet powerful effects of this wonderful remedy to correct their condition and establish natural action.

THE BEST KIDNEY REMEDY.



The kidneys act as drains to carry the worn-out and poisonous substances from the system, and kidney complaints always injure the general health because these worn-out substances are retained in the body. For all kidney troubles, weakness and pain in the back, and diseases of the urinary organs, there is no medicine in the world which gives so certain and positive a cure as Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC.

Pronounced by the Newspapers, Ministers, Doctors, Lawyers and the people everywhere as the BEST SPRING MEDICINE KNOWN.

Do not fail to use this wonderful discovery if you wish to be cured. Be sure and call for Dr. GREENE'S NERVURA NERVE TONIC. Insist upon having it, and do not be persuaded to take any thing else, for this is indeed the greatest and best of all spring medicines. All druggists keep it. Price, $1 per bottle. Should any druggist not have it he will get it for you. DR. DR. WILBOR'S
COMPOUND OF Pure Cod Liver Oil And Phosphates

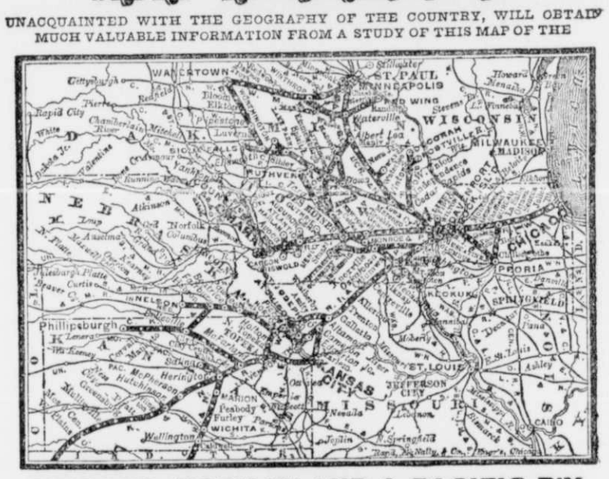
OF LIME, SODA, IRON.

It has required much experience and care to enable the proprietor to combine the oil and Phosphates so that they would become thoroughly efficacious together, and he has the only recipe by which this can be accomplished. Another important advantage which the Pure Cod Liver Oil possesses prepared in this way, over the plain cod liver oil, is the fact that besides adding largely to its medical qualities, it preserves the oil pure and sweet for a longer period than it can be done in any other manner. This fact alone would recommend this form of using the Oil even if the phosphates did not also add vastly to the healing qualities of the preparation. The perfect incorporation of the phosphates with the cod liver oil has only been accomplished by the adoption of the most perfect rules of chemistry; and a medicine has been produced which, while it is so efficacious, is also perfectly palatable and pleasant.

CURES

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, DEBILITY, WASTING DISEASES, and all SCROFULOUS HUMORS.



Almost as palatable as cream. It can be taken with pleasure by delicate persons and children, who, after using it, become very fond of it. It assimilates with the food, increases the flesh and appetite, builds up the nervous system, restores energy to mind and body, creates new, rich and pure blood, in fact, rejuvinates the whole system,

FLESH, NERVE, BLOOD, BRAIN.

This preparation is far superior to all other preparations of Cod-Liver Oil; it has many imitators, but no equals. The results following its use are its best recommendations. Be sure, as you value your health, and get the genuine. Manufactured only by DR. ALEXR. B. WILBOR, Chemist, Boston, Mass. Send for illustrated circular, which will be mailed free. SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1888.

The interest on the part of our townspeople in higher education must be on the increase, judging from the number of students in attendance at "Massey Hall." Classes in the different grades are taught from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M., each day, and yet, owing to limited room, the principal is compelled to decline applicants for admission almost daily. It is a matter of regret that this tried institution is so hampered. There is no reason in limitation in educational matters here, nor wisdom in sending boys away for the academic and preparatory course they could obtain more effectually and with less expense at home. Further assistance towards additional buildings would insure a high grade classical school which would be a credit to the town and of vast import and profit to our county.

How does it happen that the products of "the poor farmer" whose onerous burdens, produced by the tariff, have been the cry of the reformers, are made to bear fully two-thirds of the reductions made by the Mills bill. Sugar, wool, hemp, peanuts, flax, jute, beeswax, vegetables, chicory, acorns, dandelions, milk, beans, peas, figs, feathers, broom corn, castor beans, rice, raisins, and many other products of the farm are put on the free list, or the duty materially reduced. The reduction on these articles, if the Mills theory is true, amounts to more than two-thirds of the whole. What about the "poor farmers?"

Report says that the President is soon to visit West Virginia. Wonder what is bringing him. Can he be coming to see how well we are pleased with the prospect of free wool, free salt, free lumber and the closing of our potteries? To insure a thoroughly warm welcome he should bring with him Mr. Mills, who has sought in his feeble way to give practical form to the destructive doctrine preached by the President of the United States. It would give West Virginians great pleasure to show the President what we have in this State and what it is that he and the majority of his party propose to throttle. Object lessons have been found very instructive. — Wheeling Intelligencer.

Legislative Notes.

Since our last report but one new bill has been reported for this county, namely: To provide that the $1200 which has been heretofore given by the State to the public school fund of this county, be given to the public academy.

The following acts for this county, have passed both houses and been signed by the Governor:

Relating to Sheriff's fees.

Relating to Surveyor's fees.

Repealing the act creating the 12th district.

To regulate trials before justices of the peace.

Repealing the act authorizing the sheriff to employ a warden.

Amending the Deer Park Charter.

Refunding to R. T. Browning money erroneously paid into the State treasury.

Requiring county treasurer to disburse jury and State witness fund, instead of Clerk of Circuit Court.

To reimburse Garrett county for State school fund withheld in 1887.

The bill changing the mode of appointment of School Commissioners, by placing the appointing power in the hands of the Governor, has passed both houses, and only awaits the signature of the Governor to become a law.

On Tuesday Mr. Friend obtained leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the local option law of this county, and to enable the voters of the county to vote on the question of license or no license.

Annapolis Letter.

ANNAPOLIS, MD., March 3, 1888.

ED. REPUBLICAN:—The legislative session of 1888 is fast drawing to a close, and a forecast of the business of the session can now be pretty accurately made; and it is now known that the class of people who were silly enough to believe there was any sincerity in Democratic professions of honesty of purpose, have again been feeding on the east wind of broken promises.

There has never been a time when the bearing of the majority has been so arrogant, and when they have so flagrantly set at defiance every consideration of decency and justice.

Every Democrat in the State who had the manhood to stand up and assert his manhood by opposing in any way the cut-and-dry methods of the Ring has been publicly humiliated, turned down and spit upon; and the boodle gang have been particularly active this session devising means to find places or make places for the faithful.

It would take a very long letter even to outline the most that has been done, or attempted to be done, in this direction since the beginning of the session.

I propose to notice briefly the new registration law, of which so much has been expected.

Before the election last fall we all remember the frantic appeals made by the Ring Democracy, and the sacred pledges that they would enact a satisfactory registration law, and it was tacitly agreed that the law should be based on the Tilden law, and that it should conform closely to its provisions to the bill to be prepared by the Reform League of Baltimore.

The bill prepared by the Reform League would have been a fair and practical measure, and would have prevented the shameful frauds by which the party in power perpetuates its control, and would not have been any more expensive than the old law, besides it would have been more representative in its character. It provides for the appointment by the County Commissioners of three Election Commissioners, who in turn appoint three judges and two clerks for each election district, who sit as a board of Registration and also as Judges of Election. Their pay was fixed at three dollars per day, and they were to be allowed full pay for seven days' services and no more for the year of general registration. They were to be allowed for four days' services in the other years, or the years of revision. The general registrations was to be made quadrennially in Presidential years. The other years the lists were to be simply revised. The expenses in the years of general registration would be $105 for each election district, including judges and clerks on election days, and for the three intermediate years it would be $60 dollars a year, including the election expenses, or about the same as it is at present, averaging the years.

It was too much to expect, however, that the boodle gang would allow such a measure to become a law. Some of the counties would elect Republican Commissioners and they might appoint a board of Election Commissioners a majority of which would be Republicans, and they in turn might appoint a majority of Republican judges and this would deprive the boodle gang of part of their patronage. The registration officers would have to yield up their snug little plumb, and this could not be thought of. It is not hard to detect the injustice of such a measure in counties like Garrett, where there is a solid Republican majority, and that majority composed of the solid men of the county, but the spoils system must not be interfered with and I am sure the voice and influence of each of Garrett's Democratic representatives here was in favor of the old law and not the new.

So the new registration bill, of which so much was hoped and expected, will not be passed, but some sort of patch work device will be put on the old law and it will be made more expensive and less serviceable than before. The latest election bill was a patch work arrangement of this kind, and under its provisions the Registration officers would receive about $100 each instead of $60 as at present. So the tendancy is toward higher taxes and more bummers. The question is how long will the people endure it?

Yours truly,

W.

The Legislative Session.

The Legislature of Maryland has now entered upon the last month of the session, and if any of the real work expected of it is to be done, it will be necessary to throw overboard the big deck load of trivial stuff, as well as a lot of the contraband freight which may be stowed away snugly with the legitimate cargo of the ship of State. During the past sixty days sixty-eight local bills have been passed. Not one measure of a general or important nature has been matured, though the fact should not be overlooked in this connection that some very unwise and prejudicial schemes, urged on the Legislature by outside pressure, have been driven to cover and practically defeated. But making every allowance for all this, the record of the Legislature already made is not calculated to encourage the patriotic and practical citizen. The fact that any established business may be subjected by self-seekers and schemers in the lobbies at Annapolis to annoyance, and threatened with onerous, unjust or fatal conditions, will naturally keep the public mind agitated, and to a large extent unfit for the pursuit of the every-day affairs of life. It would be bad enough if public anxiety were limited to those political concerns upon which parties divide and campaign issues are made up, but when solicitude for the fruits of legitimate industry, or for the very existence, perhaps, of private business enterprises, is added, the strain is too great to be borne with equanimity or patience. It is not a pleasant thing to say, but it is nevertheless a fact that to the minds of many people the Legislature is a burthen rather than a blessing or an aid to good government. One would have supposed that the peculiar campaign which preceded the last general election could not have failed to impress every successful candidate with its lessons strongly that he would feel it his bounden duty to carry out every promise and redeem every pledge as sacredly as if his his own bond had been given for the settlement of the obligation. The failure so far to redeem these pledges, and the pretexts which from time to time have been forthcoming as excuses for evasion, have had such an effect upon the public mind that thirty days of solid work in the right line on square legislative business will have to be put in to remove the bad impression which has already been made. A great deal may be done in this brief time if it is properly improved, and it is incumbent upon the Legislature, individually and collectively, to do all that it is possible to do, not only to redeem party pledges, but to redeem its own record, and establish public confidence. It is somewhat encouraging of hope in this direction that for the present week several of the important measures before the Legislature have been set down as special orders, and it is trusted that their proper consideration will not be interfered with by lesser matters, by annoying jobs or further schemes to embarrass business.—Baltimore Sun, Monday.

Union Soldiers Defended by Senator Ingalls.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 3.—The Senate to-day resumed consideration as the unfinished business of the bill granting pensions to ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated from the performance of manual labor and providing for pensions to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors; the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, to insert the words "from infirmities."

Mr. Ingalls, the presiding officer, having called Mr. Platt to the chair proceeded to address the Senate, the galleries being crowded to their full capacity. He said he had been surprised one day last week on returning to the chamber after a brief absence to learn that the Senator from Missouri (Vest) had referred to him in terms not complimentary in a debate, in which he had taken no part, and had coupled with the personal remarks an intimation that the people of the District of Columbia were incapable of disinterested patriotism, and that the veterans of the Republic were a mob of sordid plunderers. As to himself, he would say that the nomination and election of Grover Cleveland had made the pretensions of any American citizen to the Presidency respectable. There was no man in this country whose ignorance was so profound, whose obscurity so impenetrable, whose antecedents so degraded that he had no no right to aspire to the presidential nomination by the Democratic party.

He regretted that the Senator from Missouri was not in his seat to-day. He should not imitate that Senator's bad example, and would confine himself, so far as he was concerned, to the Senator's autobiography. That Senator was born in a State that had not seceded (the State of Kentucky), and had represented in the Confederate Congress the State of Missouri, a State which had not seceded. It would be gratifying to a historian to find out how he had been admitted to represent a State which had never seceded. But that was a matter of ancient history.

The Senator from Kentucky (Blackburn) had also referred sneeringly to the super-loyalty, of the soldiers of the Union. He did not challenge the honor or courage of these Senators on their devotion to the South and to the Southern confederacy. They could not be suspected of insincerity. They had gone into the confederacy because they wanted to go, because they believed that slavery was better than freedom and secession better than union. It was curious that confederates from Union States were a little more pronounced, and a little more aggressive, and a little more violent in their denunciations North than confederates from States that had seceded. He did not know where the Senator from Missouri had got the figures from when he stated that 8,000 of Lee's army had surrendered at Appomatox.

If that Senator had plucked a few of the plumes from the dazzling tail of his imagination and had stuck them in the wings of his judgment, he would have flown a more accurate flight. Instead of 8,000 men with muskets who were in the final crash and collision of the war, there had been 73,911 men.

He wanted the Senators on the Democratic side of the chamber to understand that their disguise for opposing pension bills was so exceedingly thin that nobody was deceived by it. It was not a question of cost. The South did not love the Union army. Neither did the Democratic party.

Mr. Morgan reminded Mr. Ingalls that the Democratic party had nominated and sustained a federal officer, General Hancock, for the Presidency.

"Yes," said Mr. Ingalls, "It did support General Hancock and it also supported Horace Greely." Why was it that when an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who by one of the strange caprices of history, now sat in judgment upon those great Constitutional amendments that were adopted against his protest and efforts—why was it that when he arose in the Senate and said he would resent as a personal affront any imputation upon the honor or the integrity and patriotism of Jefferson Davis, when he said he had no doubt that Jefferson Davis would occupy a niche in history by the side of George Washington—why was it no Senator on the Democratic side (North or South) arose to repudiate and disavow it? And yet the moment an honorable Senator on the Republican side, or any editor of any Northern paper or any organ of the Grand Army talked about Union armies, the grandeur of their achievments, the obligations of the Nation, they were taunted with waving the ensanguined undergarment, raking up the ashes of sectional strife, appealing to partisan hatred and malice.

The South should be thankful that it did not have to foot the entire pension bill as France did after the Franco-Prussian war.

The Senator from Missouri had asked, in a burst of indignation, where this was going to end. "I will tell him," said Mr. Ingalls, "whether he likes it or not, what we intend to do. I will tell the Senator from Missouri, and the rest of his associates, just where this thing is going to stop. It is going to stop when the arrears of pensions are paid."

Four More States.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4.—Representative Springer, in behalf of the majority of the Committee on Territories, has prepared a report which he will present to the House, recommending the passage of what is known as the "Omnibus" bill to enable the people of Dakota, Montana, Washington and New Mexico to form State governments and to be admitted into the Union on an equality with the other States. The report gives a statement of the population and resources of each of the proposed States.

Dakota, it says, has an area of 96,596,480 acres, an estimated population in 1887 of 568,477, and a taxable property valuation of $157,084,365. Attention is called to the fact that 26,847,115 acres, comprising more than one-fourth of the entire area of the Territory, is Indian reservation land and excluded from the jurisdiction of the proposed State. The climate in the northern portion of the Territory and the character of the lands west of the Missouri river are also stated to be such as to preclude the possibility of a dense population in those regions. If, however, the Indian titles should hereafter be extinguished, and the population become so great as to make a single State unwieldly, Congress, the report says, may provide for its division into two States. No imperative reason is seen why the Territory should be divided at the present time.

Montana, the report says, has an area of 95,016,648 acres, a population estimated to amount to 175,000 in November next, and a taxable property valuation in 1866 of $57,076,871. The Indian reservations in the Territory comprise 20,574,648 acres.

The area of Washington Territory is placed at 44,796,160 acres, of which 4,107,558 are Indian reservations; its population in November next is estimated at 160,000, and its taxable property in 1887 is given as about $56,000,000, not including railroad property. Reference is also made to its great mineral and timber resources.

The area of New Mexico is placed at 71,568,640 acres, of which 9,586,225 is comprised within Indian reservations. An official census in 1885 showed its population to be 131,141, and its taxable property in 1886 amounted to $56,000,000.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, March 5th, 1888.—Senator Hiscock's, Presidential boom has made rapid strides toward the front during the past few days.

"Deacon" White, who represents one of the Brooklyn, N. Y., districts in the House of Representatives and who is also generally believed to represent Jay Gould, and his manifold interests in the same body, made himself conspicuous by spiritedly attacking the Pacific railroad telegraph bill in the House on Saturday. His argument was perfectly absurd. He said that the pending bill was only buncome and would accomplish nothing that the present laws failed to do, and yet the gentleman was ready to foam at the mouth for fear the bill would pass, as it subsequently did.

The uncalled for slurs against the Grand Army of the Republic in which Senator Vest indulged while making a speech in the Senate on Wednesday in opposition to the Dependent Pension bill, have lowered him in the estimation of his own party associates. It was certainly in very bad taste for a man who took a prominent part in trying to destroy the Government of this country, to stand under the dome of the Capitol and try to deprive the preservers of the Union of their hard-earned pensions. That such a state of things should be possible speaks volumes for the forbearance of the United States Government in dealing with traitors.

Senator Sherman's bill amending the laws governing Chinese emmigration passed through the Senate safely on Thursday. Among its most violent antagonizers was the Senator from Florida, Mr. Call, who characterized the bill as one undertaking to prove that the world was made wrong because of the 400 millions of Chinese in it.

The mountain which has been in labor, for lo! these many months, has at last brought forth the mouse. The tariff bill prepared by the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and which was submitted to the whole committee and made public, was the event of the week at the Capitol. It has already made a perceptible chasm in the Democratic party. It does not go far enough for the out and out free traders while it goes entirely too far in the direction of free trade for the Randall wing of the Democratic party. Mr. Randall calls the bill vicious.

The new bill is heartily approved by Cleveland and his Secretary of the Treasury. Nothing strange in that, as it is more than probable that they both had a hand in its construction. Still it is extremely doubtful whether all the power of the Administration, which will undoubtedly be brought to bear on objecting members, can succeed in getting the bill passed by the House. Petitions are already beginning to come in opposing the passage of the bill, the very first received being from the glass blowers.

Senator Vance says the bill does not meet with the wishes of North Carolina because it omits internal revenue relief. Members and Senators from the tobacco growing states all object to it because it does not repeal the tobacco tax.

The Senate Committee on the District of Columbia have decided in favor of local option for the District, and an effort will shortly be made to give its citizens an opportunity to decide the much agitated question of liquor by their own votes.

The Dependent Pension bill has been amended by the Senate to include all soldiers who served in the war with Mexico and all who served for thirty days or more in any of the Indian wars.

The House Committee on invalid pensions has favorably reported the bill relating to claims for pension by dependent parents. It provides that in considering such claims, it having been shown after the soldier's death that he was entitled to a pension, and that he left no widow or dependent children, it shall be necessary to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such parent or parents are without other means of support than their own manual labor or the contributions not legally bound for their support. The same committee also favorably reported a bill providing that the pension money of any pensioner who is in the habit of becoming intoxicated and who neglects to support those lawfully dependent upon him, shall be paid to the wife of such pensioner, if she be a proper person to receive it, or to a legally constituted and qualified guardian.

Again last week Senator Paddock paid his respects to the Administration in some pointed remarks upon the present inefficient mail service that is being given to the country.

Review of Trade.

NEW YORK, March 2.—Following is R. G. Dun & Co.'s review of trade for the week ending March 3: Actual business is satisfactory for the season. Prospects are confused and uncertain, in some directions promising but in other branches of large importance decidedly clouded. The passage by the House of the bill authorizing bond purchases was designed to renew the monetary uncertainty, an influence which affects all trade and industry. Whether the Senate will pass the bill in its present form is not yet certain, and Secretary Fairchild's report makes questionable whether the measure, if passed, would prove an adequate reliance for the prevention of Treasury assumption of money. But many think it will give full relief, and that impression gave hopefulness to the slack market for one day. Lower prices immediately followed, however.

The western railroad wars and strikes continued to disturb business. Because of a cut by the Canadian lines, the eastern trunk roads announced a reduction of ten per cent on east and westbound rates, March 5th, and efforts to settle the western war were defeated on Thursday by the St. Paul. Only a partial revival of traffic on the Burlington & Quincy has been attained. At prevailing rates business is not so profitable that the company is impatient. While the earnings of railroads continue to show that a large quantity of freight for the season is in motion, the rates are dropping and expenses on many lines are increasing, the Pennsylvania has advanced wages on the western lines ten per cent.

An important cause of uncertainty in many branches of trade is the movement to change the tariff. Whether the proposed changes are deemed desirable or not, those who think them probable are for that reason moved to defer business operations. The bill submitted on Thursday would affect so many industries and branches of trade that individual opinions, favorable or unfavorable to it, must cousiderably influence transactions while it remains pending. It comes at a time when, for other reasons, there is hesitation in most of the branches chiefly concerned, and increases that hesitation. It is a characteristic of many trades at present, that purchases and operations are, for one reason and onother, limited to present necessities.

In the boot and shoe trade, which is otherwise exceptionally satisfactory, there are some such indications as to women's and children's goods; in the cottons the recent signs of halting may be attributed to unusually large dealings in the past; in the sugar and other trades the operations of trusts and combinations cause uncertainty. The coal business, since the strikes began to collapse, have been marked by only hand to mouth dealings, in doubt as to the future output.

The prices of wool are steady, with Ohio XX at 32c, and buyers have been operating with some freedom, but any advance has been resisted, and the effects of the proposal to change the duties are not yet seen. A large failure in the lumber and salt interests in Michigan, following the remarkable shrinkage in the demand for iron ore, indicates that the prospect in that region is not wholly unclouded. Elsewhere the iron trade is hesitating with somewhat lower prices at Pittsburgh, while Youngstown works resolve to close unless better railroad rates enable them to meet Southern competition. In the East the supply increases while orders halt.

No unfavorable indications appear in reports of trade or of collections in any part of the country. Money is everywhere comparatively easy, though at Boston and other important points it is felt that a revival of business activity would soon be followed by some pressure.

Southern trade is clearly improving, and there are signs of renewed real estate activity at some Western points.

The Treasury has returned by banks $1,400,000 of the deposits during the week, and in all took in $4,900,000 more cash than it paid out. For the month of February the debt reduction was $7,560,000, almost entirely through the increase in cash on hand, though $5,000,000 was paid surrendered bank notes, and the bank circulation diminished $3,15,508.

The volume of trade represented by payments through the clearing houses is about 2½ per cent larger than last year outside of New York, but with noticeable losses at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati and Kansas City.

Save me all the three-cent pieces you get. They are so handy for missionary and church purposes on Sunday. You see they can always tell when you throw in a nickel from its heavy dull thud, but the graceful three-cent piece goes in like a dime and sounds so respectable. You can throw in a three-cent piece alongside of a nickel christian and assume an air of quiet dignity. Yes, darling, save your three-cent pieces.

Another Old Citizen Gone.

Garrett county has lost one of its oldest, most respected and virtuous citizens, in the death of Major Philip Durst, on the 29th of February, 1888, at his home in Smooth Valley, near Grantsville, at the mature age of seventy-one. He was considerately buried at the Old Blocher Cemetery, near by, among his ancestors, who first came to this vicinity over a century ago. He had been in failing health and strength for some months, and his vitality was too far wasted to endure the rugged winter, yet lingering. He had been expecting death and often spoke of it, and which he did not fear. The Major had been a widower since 1870, his deceased wife being once the widow of the late Peter Yeast. He left no children. Always led a very quiet and retired life, perfectly inoffensive and harmless throughout. Honest, upright and pure in all his dealings and ways. By nature, more than cultivation, an old fashioned gentleman, which no decent man could fail to see and respect. Not robust in intellect, yet intelligent, discreet and judicious, and his system of life useful and agreeable to those with whom he had intercourse. He will be very much missed, especially on account of his extensive amount of personal and local information and recolections. In land matters, as to locations, lines and boundaries, he was an excellent reference. But there is none left to fill his place.

Marriage of Col. Skeep Keller.

Col. J. Skeep Keller and Miss Lou DeWitt were married at Kingsley Chapel, in Cumberland, Wednesday evening, Feb. 22, by Rev. J. P. Wilson, and after a visit of a few days to friends and relatives at Davis and Frostburg, returned on Tuesday to this place, where they will make their future home. Col. Keller is the manager of the well-known Keller House in this place, and one of our most prominent and honorable business men; and his bride is one of the best ladies of Garrett county, Md., in every sense of that word, and also one of the fairest. To both we tender our hearty congratulations and our best wishes for a long and happy life. May your honeymoon, unlike the tri-formed luminary that shone with such auspicious splendor on your wedding eve, never wane, but may its brightness ever be sufficient to dispel the darkest clouds that may gather over your future pathway, and be lost to memory only with the setting of the sun of life! May your shadow never grow less! —South Branch Intelligencer.

Donation.

A raid was made upon the U. B. Parsonage, Glade Circuit, Jan. 31st, 1888. A company of forty-three came, with songs, and after compassing the parsonage three times, were invited in. After a pleasant time they left, leaving valuables such as a preacher and his family needs, amounting in value to twenty-six dollars, for which the donors have my heartfelt thanks, and I humbly pray that the richest blessings of our Heavenly Father may rest upon them. The donation was gotten up by friends near South Point, outside of the membership of the U. B. Church.

W. H. ALBERT, pastor.

Red House.

Please allow space in your paper for a short notice of the closing exercises of the Mason School, which, after one of the most pleasant terms ever taught here, closed on Friday, Feb. 24th. The school closed one week earlier than the rest, as the teacher and patrons thought best to continue the school through the Holidays, on account of measles which were raging in adjoining neighborhoops at that time, and by keeping the school open and the scholars together not one case occurred in the school, while all other schools were closed on account of them. The examination was one of the best ever given here by any teacher, and Mr. Wm. B. Hutson, the teacher, deserves great credit for the most excellent and efficient manner in which he conducted his school, all scholars showing marked improvement in all studies, and especially does his classes deserve credit for the excellent examinations they passed in geography. The House was filled by the parents of the children and all were pleased beyond expectation at their progress. The teacher supplied the children with a bountiful treat, consisting of candy, peanuts and apples, after which speeches were made by many, prominent among which were the teacher, H. G. Sanders and B. F. Shaffer. Music was furnished by Proff. S. J. Yutzy. A pleasant and profitable day was spent by all.

Mountain Lake Park.

The warm days and frequent showers of rain had removed nearly all of the old snow, and quite a number of the spring birds could be heard; but Sunday night there came a great change. Monday morning the ground was well covered with snow, and by evening it had fallen to the depth of about eight inches. This (Tuesday) morning the mercury is still lower and more snow is falling.

The Bowman store building will soon be ready for use.

Mr. R. S. Jamison has completed the deepening of Mr. List's well, making it, I believe, thirty feet deeper.

Mrs. Bullard has returned, accompanied by her mother, Miss Rachel and little Aggie. They will remain until the first of May.

Miss Mamie Deffinbaugh and Miss Emma Brooke, of Oakland, were with us over Sunday.

Accident School Report.

Following are the names of pupils of Accident school that attained the highest average in the examination held the last of February, 1888:

1st. Grade.—Eddie McMillen 98, Willie McMillen 98, Lizzie Thompson 96, Clara Gnagey 96, Jona Speicher 96, and Bertha Glotfelty 95.

2d Grade.—Emma Hinebaugh 94, Ettie Ault 94, Mary Biddinger 94, Carrie Boyer 93, Frank Hinebaugh, 93, Henry Speicher 93, Martha Gnagey 92, John Marcroff 92, Willie Gnagey 89, Harvy Speicher 88.

The names of pupils that have been present every day during the Fall and Winter terms, are as follows: Jona Speicher, Henry Speicher, John Hentfling, Asa Gnagey, George Ries, Lizzie Thompson, and quite a number being absent but one day.

Number of pupils studying Geometry, 4; Algebra, 4; Physiology, 18; Philosophy, 7.

The last day of school was principally devoted to spelling and music.

The school appreciated very highly the music rendered by Mr. William Keller, William Bowman, Jake Keller and Miss Nellie DeWitt.

After the music the school was addressed by Mr. Jonas Feak, taking for his subject: "The Great Need of Education."

We were exceedingly glad to have with us the following visitors: Mrs. Dr. E. H. Glotfelty, Mrs. Eli McMillen, Miss Katie Ault, Miss Maggie Poe, Miss Vergie Hingbaugh, Miss Flea Swalp, Miss Dora Kaese, Mr. John Englehart, Mr. Jonas Feak and Mr. Eli McMillen. We hope that others may profit by their example and deem it a pleasure to enter the schol-room and spend an hour or two with us. The children are thus encouraged if their parents take an interes in their welfare.

W. E. BOYER, Principal.

Davis Mills.

We have organized a literary society here, and a number of subjects have been discussed. The subject for our next meeting, (Thursday night,) is, "Resolved that Washington deserves more honor for the freedom than Columbus for the discovery of America."

The making of cross-ties is the principal industry here at this season of the year.

Mr. C. Kimmell is preparing to burn a large kiln of lime.

A large Dunkard church will be erected here soon.

Members of Isaac King's family are still quite ill.

Mrs. J. J. Garrett has been very ill for three or four weeks.

Mr. A. S. Sell will soon move his steam saw mill onto Mr. Chauncey Kimmell's farm.

Mr. George Rodeheaver has rented Mr. Thos. Nethkin's farm.

Our school closed on Feb. 29th, with a spelling bee with scholars from neighboring schools.

Rev. D. B. Orr commences a protracted meeting at the Dodge school house Sunday, March 18th.

Lost Pig.

A Poland-China male pig, (last May's litter) black and white spots, no ear marks, strayed from my farm last October. A suitable reward will be paid for information that will lead to its recovery.

Randall's Tariff Bill.

WASHINGTON, March 6.—There is no longer any doubt of the position of Mr. Randall. He will not only oppose the tariff bill of Mr. Mills, but he will oppose it with zest.

Randall was invited, with a good many other leaders of the Democratic party, to present his views to the Democratic members of the committee. He did not accept this invitation, but he has consulted with Republican leaders and with the immediate representatives of the protective industries. It is in accordance with the suggestion received from some of them that he has framed his bill so that it will not interfere with the great protective industrial schedules. In fact, he proposes a practical increase in some respects. Instead of putting tin plate, for instance, on the free list, it is understood that he fixes a duty of two cents a pound thereon. He has also so arranged the cotton and woolen schedules that they will receive the cordial support of the manufacturers. He proposes not to have his bill given to the public until after the meeting of the committee, but its features are generally known. He proposes to effect a reduction in the revenue of about $80,000,000 on the basis of the receipts of the last fiscal year, and will nominally include both customs and internal taxes. The actual reduction in rates, however, is almost wholly confined to the internal revenue. The changes which he will propose as to customs will consist chiefly in additions to the free list. He will provide for a reduction of all the taxes upon tobacco.

He will propose to reduce the tax on whisky from 90 to 45 cents per gallon, and to abolish nearly all of the special internal revenue license taxes. The reductions which he contemplates are distributed as follows: Tobacco, $30,000,000; spirits distilled from fruits, $1,000,00; whisky, $30,000,000; special taxes, $2,000,000; total internal revenue reduction, $63,000,000. The remainder, or $17,000,000, to make up his total reduction of $80,000,000 in the surplus is to be taken from the customs list, and will be made up, with few exceptions, of transfers from the dutiable to the free list.

Mr. Garrett in Singapore.

CHICAGO, March 5.—A dispatch from San Francisco says: Word has been received from Singapore that Robert Garrett, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with his party and a retinue of servants, has arrived there. Garrett made only a short stay in China, owing to the smallpox epidemic at the port at which he landed. He will take a leisurely tour through India and will then proceed to Hamburg, going most of the way by steamer. After spending the summer at Hamburg he will visit other European cities, and return to Baltimore about November. From Singapore it was reported that the sea voyage had greatly improved his health.

A Good Remedy for Burns.

Many remedies at one time or another have been proposed for the surgical condition following the application for excessive heat to the body, and, while some of these are of value, all are more or less unsatisfactory. The alleviation of the pain and suffering attendant upon burns is one of the most important points in the case toward which the surgeon directs his efforts. The shock from this cause alone is sufficient, oftentimes, to produce death, and always is great. Accidentally, I recently discovered a remedy which is easily applied and exceedingly prompt in its action. I was called in some haste to a little child, about three weeks ago, who was badly burned about the hands and face from falling on a hot stove. The burns were deep, the pain excessive and the shock very considerable. I sent to the drug store for a mixture of lime water, olive oil and carbolic acid. While waiting for this, I prepared to give the child a hypodermic injection of morphine, with which to allay the agony, which was so great that convulsions seemed imminent. While I was getting ready to do this, I espied upon the shelf a bottle of Canada balsam (colorless). Remembering its wonderful soothing influence in acute inflamation, I at once concluded to try it. Taking a corner of a soft handkerchief I rapidly painted the injured parts, when, like magic, the pain ceased. You can well imagine my surprise and delight at the result. I directed a camel's hair brush to be purchased, and had the mother make free applications, and the case had no more treatment, save a little iodoform, later on. Since this, I have tried it in several cases, both slight and severe, and with the same delightful results.

This valuable remedy should be in the house of every man in the land, it will save suffering and possibly life.

LIGHT OF HOME.

O, light of home, O, light of home,
The purest light 'neath heaven's dome!
The light that shines so clear and white,
There ever is our heart's delight,
The light of home.

O, light of home, blest light of home!
When far from thee our footsteps roam,
We think of thee, still gleaming bright;
Ah! How we long to see the sight
Of light at home.

O, light of home, true light of home!
When far across the ocean's foam,
The wind and waves in storm unite,
My heart hies to my home to-night,
Loved light of home.

O, light of home, fair light of home!
To thee may weary wanderers come;
A beacon light in darkest night,
Thy glimmer never can affright,
O, light of home.

O, light of home, our Heavenly home!
To thee we look, to thee we come;
Our loved ones live in that pure light,
Ah! Some time we shall see the sight
Of light at home.

A STOWAWAY.

The Boy Who Proved Himself a "True Englishman."

"Ay, ay, sir; they're smart seamen enough, no doubt, them Dalmatians, and reason good, too, seein' they man half the Austrian navy; but they ain't got the seasonin' of an Englishman, put it how yer will!"

I am standing on the upper deck of the Aurtrian Lloyd steamer, and beside me, with his elbow on the hand-rail and his short pipe between his teeth, lounges the chief engineer, delighted to get hold of a listener who (as he phrases it) "has been about a bit."

"No, they ain't got an Englishman's seasonin'," he continues, "and, what's more, they ain't got an Englishman's pluck, neither, when it comes to a real scrape."

"Can no one but an Englishman have any pluck, then?" asked I, laughing.

"Well, I won't just go for to say that; o' course a man as is a man 'ull have pluck in him all the world over. I've seed a Frencher tackle a shark to save his messmate; and I've seed a Rooshan stand to gun arter every man in the battery, barrin' himself had been blowed all to smash. But, if yer come to that, the pluckiest feller as ever I seed warn't a man at all?"

"What was he, then—a woman?"

"No, nor that neither; though, mark ye, I don't go for to say as how women ain't got pluck enough, too, some on 'em, at least. But this un as I'm a talkin' on was a little lad, not much bigger 'n Tom Thumb, only with a sperrit of his own as 'ud ha' blowed up a man-o'-war a'most. Would you like to hear about it?"

I eagerly assent; and the narrator, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, folds his brawny arms upon the top of the rail, and commences as follows:

"'Bout three years ago, afore I got this berth as I'm in now, I was second engineer aboard a Liverpool steamer bound for New York. There'd been a lot of extra cargo sent down just at the last minute, and we'd had no end of a job stowin' it away, and that ran us late o' startin'; so that altogether, as you may think, the cap'n warn't altogether in the sweetest temper in the world, nor the mate neither. As for the chief engineer, he was an easy-goin' sort o' chap as nothin' on earth could put out. But on the mornin' of the third day out from Liverpool, he cum down to me in a precious hurry lookin' as if somethin' had put him out pretty considerably.

"'Tom,' says he, 'what d'ye think? Blest if we aint found a stowaway.' (That's the name, you know, sir, as we gives to chaps as hides theirselves aboard out-bound vessels, and gets carried out unbeknown to everybody.

"I didn't wait to hear no more, but up on deck like a sky-rocket; and there I did see a sight, and no mistake. Every man-Jack o' the crew and what few passengers we had aboard was all in a ring on the fo'castle, and in the middle stood the first mate lookin' as black as thunder. Right in front of him, lookin' a regular mite among all them big fellers was a little bit o' a lad not ten years old—ragged as a scarecrow, but with bright, curly hair and a bonnie little face o' his own, if it hadn't been so woeful thin and pale. But, bless yer soul! to see the way that little chap held his head up and looked about him, you'd ha' thought the whole ship belonged to him. The mate was a great, hulkin', black-bearded feller, with a look that 'ud ha' frightened a horse, and a voice fit to make one jump through a keyhole; but the young un warn't a bit afeard—he stood straight up, and looked him full in the face with them bright, clear, eyes, o' his'n, for all the world as if he was Prince Halfred himself. Folk did say afterward (lowering his voice to a whisper) as how he'd come o' better blood nor what he ought, and, for my part, I'm rayther o' that way o' thinkin' myself, for I never yet seed a common street Harab (as they calls 'em now) carry it off like him. You might ha' heard a pin drop as the mate spoke.

"'Well, you young whelp,' said he, in his grimmest voice, 'what brought you here?'

"'It was my step-father as done it,' says the boy in a weak little voice, but as steady as could be. 'Father's dead, and mother's dead again, and my new father says as how he won't have no brats about eatin' up his wages; and he stowed me away when nobody warn't lookin', and gave me some grub to keep me goin' for a day or two till I got to sea. He says I'm to go to Aunt Jane at Halifax; and here's her address.'

"And with that he slips his hand into the breast of his shirt, and out with a scrap o' paper, awful dirty, and crumbled up, but with the address on it, right enough.

"We all believed every word on't, even without the paper; but his look and his voice and the way he spoke was enough to show that there warn't a ha'porth o' lyin' in his whole skin. But the mate didn't seem to swaller the yarn at all; he only shrugged his shoulders with a kind o' grin, as much as to say: 'I'm too old a bird to be caught with that kind o' chaff;' and then he says to him, 'Look here, my lad, that's all very fine, but it won't do here—some of these men o' mine are in the secret, and I mean to have it out of 'em. Now you just point out the man as stowed you away and fed you, this very minute; if you don't it'll be the worse for you.'

"The boy looked up in his bright, fearless way, and says quite quietly: 'I've told you the truth; I ain't got no more to say.'

"The mate says nuthin,' but looks at him for a minute as if he'd see clean through him, and then he faced round to the men, lookin' blacker than ever. 'Reeve a rope to the yard!' he sings out, loud enough to raise the dead; 'smart now.'

"'Now, my lad,' says the mate, in a hard, square kind o' voice that made every word seem like fittin' a stone into a wall, 'you see that 'ere rope? Well, I'll give you ten minutes to confess' (he took out his watch and held it in his hand) 'and if you don't tell the truth afore the time's up, I'll hang you like a dog!'

"The crew all stared at one another as if they couldn't believe their ears (I didn't believe mine, I can tell ye), and then a low growl went among 'em, like a wild beast awakin' out of a nap.

"'Silence there!' shouts the mate in a voice like the roar of a nor'easter. 'Stand by to run for'ard!' and with his own hands he put the noose about the boy's neck. The little fellow never flinched a bit, but there were some among the sailors, (big, strong chaps, as could ha' felled a ox) as shook like leaves in the wind. As for me, I bethought myself o' my little curly-haired lad at home, and how it 'ud be if any one was to go for to hang him, and at the very thought on 't I tingled all over, and my fingers clinched themselves as if they was agrippin' somebody's throat. I clutched hold o' a handspike and held it behind my back all ready.

"'Tom,' whispers the chief engineer to me, 'd'ye think he really means to do it?'

"'I don't know,' says I, through my teeth; 'but if he does he shall go first, if I have to swing for it!'

"'Eight minutes!' says the mate, his great, deep voice breakin' in upon the silence like the toll of a funeral bell. 'If you've got any thing to confess, my lad, you'd best out with it, for yer time's nearly up.'

"'I've told you the truth,' answers the boy, very pale, but as firm as ever. 'May I say my prayers, please?'

"The mate nodded; and down goes the poor little chap on his knees (with that infernal rope about his neck all the time), and puts up his poor little hands to pray. I couldn't make out what he said (fact, my head was in sitch a whirl that I hardly ha' knowed my own name), but I'll be bound God heard it, every word. Then he ups on his feet again and puts his hands behind him and says to the mate, quite quietly, 'I'm ready!'

"And then, sir, the mate's hard, grim face broke up all at once, like I've seed the ice on the Baltic. He snatched up the boy in his arms and kissed him, and bust out a-cryin' like a child; and I think there warn't one of us as didn't do the same. I know I did for one.

"'God bless you, my boy!' says he, smoothin' the child's hair with his great, hard hand. 'You're a true Englishman, every inch of you; you wouldn't tell a lie to save your life! Well, if so be as yer father's cast ye off, I'll be yer father from this day forth; and if I ever forget you, then may God forget me!'

"And he kep' his word, too. When we got to Halifax he found out the little un's aunt and gave her a lump o' money to make him comfortable, and now he goes to see the youngster every voyage as reg'lar as can be; and to see the pair on 'em together—the little chap so fond o' him, and not bearin' him a bit o' grudge—it's 'bout as pretty a sight as ever I seed. And now, sir, axin' yer parding, it's time for me to be goin' below; so I'll just wish yer good-night."

Origin of the Spider.

Arachne was a maiden who had attained to such expertness in weaving and embroidering that even the Nymphs, leaving their groves and fountains, would gather to admire her work. They whispered to each other that Minerva herself must have taught her; but Arachne had grown vain as she grew dextrous, and, overhearing them, denied the implication with high disdain. She would not acknowledge herself inferior even to a goddess, and finally challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, saying: "If beaten, I will bear the penalty." Minerva accepted the challenge, and the webs were woven. Arachne's was of wonderful beauty, but when she saw that of Minerva she knew that she was defeated, and in despair went and hanged herself. Minerva, moved by pity for her vain but skillful opponent, transformed her into a spider, and she and her descendants still retain a portion of her marvelous gifts of spinning and weaving.—Swiss Cros

FRESH FASHION NOTES.

No Important Changes Noticeable in the Styles for Spring Suits.

The new bengalines for spring are very soft and light in texture.

Marbled and watered plush is much in demand for fancy work.

New braid patterns on spring tailor gowns are marvels of artistic design.

Plaids and stripes will again be worn, but more by children than grown people.

The most fashionable coiffures still demand that the hair falls rather low on the forehead.

Decorated celluloid letter cases and portfolios are lovely pieces of new fancy work.

Dotted stripes are seen among new designs in cotton, silk and woolen fabrics for spring wear.

Large screen-like shades for piano lamps are made of rose petals of silk, sewn on a pink foundation frame.

The finest artistic judgment and taste is demanded and displayed in the color combinations of indoor toilets.

Surplice waists lapping over on one side and forming a V opening at the neck are in favor for house dresses of all kinds.

Round waists and shirred basques are the features on the new suits made of embroidered muslins for the ing season.

Some fine specimens of hair dressing are seen in the new coiffures which the effort to introduce the Psyche has brought out.

Embroidered muslin gowns are now in the hands of the dressmaker, who are making them up for the sprig and summer trade.

Canary yellow point d'esprit and accessories of black velvet and jet make a very effective and becoming ball gown for a dark brunette.

This may be called a ribbon season, so profuse is the use of ribbons for the decoration of dinner, ball and opera and house and five o'clock tea gowns.

The latest fad in ball issues is the dauphine tulle in all delicate shades, with designs of flowers and birds wrought in colored silks and Japanese tinsel threads.

A piano lamp on a black antique wrought-iron stand, in pink glass, with a large shade of silk or satin rose petals makes a lovely point of light in a gold and white furnished room.

Novelties in lamp shades are huge tulips, lilies and callas of satin, stiffened and molded into the petal and flower forms, and exquisitely colored, in nature's own tints by first-class artists.

The new silk cord embroidery outlined with Japanese gold thread is used on slumber cushions, head rests, wall banners, and a variety of objects in plush, silk, velvet, silk satin, and silk bolting cloth.

Braided wire hair rolls are now used to extend the puffs and fullness demanded by the latest fancies in the Pompadour and Louis XVI. styles of hair-dressing which the hair dealers are trying to establish and retain as the leading arrangement of the hair.

The latest importations of bengalines for spring wear are figured in "set" designs, printed on grounds of the various new colors, and the selvages on one side are in block patterns of colors that repeat those of the fabric. These selvages are made to form the borders of skirts and draperies.

New gingham, sateen, percales and printed cotton goods are being made up for the next season in very pretty, simple styles, with full plaited overskirts over under jupes, the draping being effected from the waist line and given easy sweep by a slash in the overskirt on each side, showing a panel of the underskirt.

Charming novelties in fancy work are white celluloid whisk-brush holders, tablets, shaving paper cases, card cases, toilet cushion cases, court plaster cases, porte mouchoirs, porte monnaies, cigar cases, sachet cases and catchalls, wash bits and diaries, decorated with hand-painted designs and made up with narrow ribbon and ribbosene, plush, satin and velvet mountings.—*N. A BLIZZARD VICTIM.

How a Traveler Suffered While Visiting in Dakota Territory.

"Yes, I am from Dakota," he replied to the hotel clerk.

"That was an awful blizzard you had there."

"It was that."

"Were you in it?"

"I was, sir."

"And have the newspaper reports been exaggerations or not?"

"They have not told it as bad as it was. One who was not there can have no idea of that awful storm. Why, sir, I started to go out, and ——"

"Were you in the house when it began?"

"No, sir. I was in a hotel in Fargo and paying four dollars per day."

"And you went out and what?"

"I started to go out, but went back, and a little ring of us played billiards nearly all the time for three days. It was awful sir, just awful. I hope never to see another while I live."

"I—I don't exactly catch on," stammered the clerk."

"Why, three extra days was twelve dollars, wasn't it, saying nothing of cigars, drinks and billiards? No, sir. The reports have not been exaggerated in the slightest. It was simply awful—awful. Give me a second floor front, please."—Detroit Free Press.

LANGUAGE OF COLORS.

Ideas and Sentiments Which Are Expressed by Different Hues.

The three primary colors, red, blue and yellow, are the base of the language, and the secondary lines, from the blending of which the most complicated and delicate tints are derived, correspond to the grammatical roots of spoken tongues.

Red is a warm color. Its type is found in the rainbow or prismatic spectrum and the common wild poppy. It is indicative of jubilation, victory and ardent love. By the law of opposites, that is to say, on the old principle that extremes meet, it is the emblem of bloodshed and revenge.

In mediæval art, blue was eminently symbolical. Azure was typical of immortality, and it became the custom to cover the coffins of children with blue cloth. The ceiling of churches were painted blue and powdered with stars, to represent the canopy of heaven over the faithful. This color was used in draperies by the old masters to typify modesty; and the Virgin Mary is found in their works clothed in a blue mantle. In heroic shields blue stood for chastity, loyalty and good repute. From this last signification, doubtless, the term "blue blood" took its rise.

Love, constancy and wisdom are the attributes of yellow. This tint is found in all its winsome purity in the common buttercup of the pastures. In China, yellow is emblamatic of faith. On the other hand, yellow stands for treason and jealousy. In Spain, the garb of the public executioner is red and yellow, and symbolizes the vengeance of the law and the infamy of the criminal. In the olden time the French were accustomed to daub the lintels of a traitor's house with yellow paint, and in commemoration of Christ's betrayal, Jews were obliged in many countries to wear garments of the same color. Judas, in the illuminated missals of the middle ages, was always pictured in yellow raiment.

The secondary colors are equally pregnant with significance. Brown, ever since the most remote period, has been the sign of woe. The dun robes of certain religious orders are eloquent of renunciation and penitence. Green, among all nations, is considered emblematic of the joy of spring and the promise of harvest. With the Greeks it betokened victory. The standards of Mahomet's armies were green. The color is still held sacred by the followers of Islam, and none but the bona fide descendants of Allah's prophet may indulge in the luxury of a green turban.

The blended hue of red and yellow, namely, orange, has been the symbol of indissoluble marriage from time immemorial. The wife of the priest of Jupiter wore an orange veil and her divorce was prohibited. The color thus became a felicitous omen. Virgil arrays Helen of Troy in a saffron bridal veil, and the wreath of orange blossoms on the head of the modern belle is a survival of the tradition.

Black, the negation of color, has a universal significance of grief and mourning. In sacred paintings it often looms up on the canvas as the shadow of evil. White, on the contrary, is the hue of innocence and virginal purity. The priests of antiquity wore white vestments, and, unconsciously, a mother dresses her newborn babe in clothing of the same spotless hue. White horses were sacrificed to the sun by the Egyptian priests.—N. Y. Press.

CHEESE THAT POISONS.

A Physician Imparts Some Practical Hints Concerning Tyrotoxicon.

"What have you been eating?"

"Nothing, doctor."

"Nothing? Where did you have dinner last night?"

"At a table d'hote restaurant," replied the young man, who had visited his physician suffering, as he supposed, from a severe attack of indigestion.

"Ah!" said the doctor, his face lightening up; "and what did you eat?"

"Well, I had soup, fish, an entree, roast, fruit, some cheese——"

"Cheese. I thought so. You've been poisoned. Cheese causes as much illness in this country as salted fish and sausages do in Germany. The subject of cheese poisoning is being investigated by analysis. Whether it arises from the milk used is not yet fully determined, but it seems probable that it does. It is most likely that the poisoning agent is in the milk before it becomes cheese. Of course, every cheese manufacturer has his theory, as to the cause of poisonous cheese, but there is no unanimity among them."

"What is your theory?"

"Cheese poison is called tyrotoxicon, and investigations have shown that the toxic agent is in the milk, owing to improper management of the same, the milk not being cooled until some hours after milking. You have only to raise the lid of a can of fresh milk that has stood for some time without cooling, and the odor certainly will not impress you pleasantly. Great care is required in handling all foods of animal origin, and although manufacturers tell you that they exercise great care and invite inspectors to their factories, yet you see by such a little thing as letting milk cool improperly poison gets into cheese, and all articles in the manufacture of which milk is used.—*N. TEMPERANCE.

DELIRIUM.

"Oh! bartender, fill
A cooling gill—
The best in your bright saloon,
To quench the flame
That burns my frame,
Like the breath of the red simoon;
Oh, God! what a dream!
How the demons scream
In agonies of woe!
The condensed shout
Of the battle rout
Of the banner fiends below.

"That's cool, thanks! pass
Another glass,
One more ere I expire;
Oh, heavens! the sight
I have seen to-night,
In the realms of endless fire;
Oh! take it away!
That owlet gray,
That hoots in the broken pane;
Oh! the dreadful pangs
Of the adder's fangs
That rankle in my brain.

"Fill another mug
From the old brown jug,
It will give me strength to bear
The demons' scowl
Where the goblins howl,
In the regions of despair;
Where skulls and bones
O'er the scorching stones
Are toss'd like scattered hail,
And brimstone rains
O'er the burning plains
In storms that never fail.

"More drink! more wine!
In a bumper join;
Oh, Christ! did you hear that scream,
The cry of doom
From the gulf of gloom?
No? no! it was not a dream.
I saw the priest
Devour'd by the beast,
The monk by the scorpion stung,
Heard the bishop ask
My whisky flask
To cool his blister'd tongue.

"Oh! one cup more
On this burning shore,
Oh, Lord! is the bottle dry?
Hear! the tiger's growl;
List! the gaunt wolves howl;
Hark! the fierce hyena's cry;
See! the dreadful things
With scales and wings
That crawl through the smoking brakes,
See! the bats in swarms
Sweep down like storms,
Across the burning lakes.

"Yes! one more drink
On perdition brink,
Ere I plunge in the fiery flood.
Come! tapster, come!
One glass of rum
To clear your skirts of blood.
Oh! many a soul
Reached the burning goal
In rum's dark liquid drenched
Through ages of time,
In the realms of crime—
Where the fires are never quenched.

SIGNING PETITIONS.

Professed Christians Putting Their Names to a Bad Use—Views of a Leading Religious Paper.

One who takes an active part in resisting the granting of licenses states that a careful examination of the petitions in a neighboring county revealed the names of a very large number of professing Christians on them. There is an earnest effort to obtain the signatures of Christians, for they carry weight. The children of this world are wise, and take great pleasure in making all possible use of those who, by their name, are supposed to be the supporters of all virtue.

To the thoughtful and conscientious there can be but one answer as to the propriety of Christians giving their names for such a use. The saloon and the church have nothing in common. We are not now concerned with abstract questions of right, but with practical duty. The saloon, as it exists with us, is an unmitigated evil, with an unmeasured power for evil. In its character, in its workings and in its results, the saloon stands as the monster iniquity of our day. It has no virtue, and it does not spare virtue. It is relentless in working ruin. No appeal can reach its heart; no argument can change its purpose. It has not any thing in common with the religion of Jesus. He came to seek and to save the lost; it seeks the upright and the good that it may drag them down to hell. In all the outgoings of its influence, the church blesses men. Goodness, truthfulness, integrity, purity and happiness grow up around it. The saloon blights all that comes under its influence; its poisonous breath is death. There can be nothing in common between earnest and spiritually-minded church members and the saloon interests.

If any one say that he has not signed a petition for a saloon, but for a respectable hotel, the answer is: The liquor trade is the same, whether carried on in the low pit or in the elegant bar-room. There may be more of the terrible results immediately and visibly associated in the former case; but the character is not different. To a large class the elegant room and the respectable company are more dangerous than the vile doggeries; for they attract by their elegance, whereas the others repel.

The plea of necessity is not a sound one. It is too late in this Christian age for that. There is no necessity for any place for the sale of liquors other than the drug stores. The entertainment of the public is a business by itself, and will be governed by the demand. The sale of liquors is local—is in a sense private. The patronage of the bar is from its own surroundings, and it thrives at the expense of the virtue, temperance prosperity, and welfare of its own community. An honest Christian man can not say in this our day that a house for the sale of liquors is a necessity in any given community. The lie is too gross to be apologized for.

If the plea is made that if the law allows the licensing of such houses, it is right to ask that the business be kept in the hand of a better class of men, the answer is: A license law may be accepted as some restriction on an evil when we can not as yet secure its entire prohibition, but it is not mandatory to the citizen. The judge may find himself in such a position that he can not do what he would like to see done; but the citizen is free, and is not in any wise under any obligation to ask that such a fountain of evil shall be opened in his community. The law is to be used by Christians to place the greatest possible restraint upon the injurious traffic, and not to shelter and support it. If all in a given community would refuse to sign such petitions, there would be a practical suppression of the evil trade. By resisting all applications, we cut off the worst, and train public sentiment for entire prohibition.

Every person who signs such a petition becomes in a measure responsible for the dire consequences. When young men are led into vicious habits, it is under the sanction of his name, even though in his heart he thinketh not so. To sign such a petition is to invite all the dangers and untold evils of the liquor trade to one's own house. The saloon is the training school of intemperance, and to sign a petition for license is to ask that such a school be opened for one's own sons. We have seen the names of worthy men to such petitions, and we have afterwards seen them weeping over their ruined sons. With a poor grace, and we may be sure, with poor effect, would any one who allowed his name to be so used, prohibit his son, or attempt to restrain his brother, from becoming a patron of the attractive place and company.

No, it is not for Christians to give their names for such uses. They should have no fellowship with the works of darkness, but rather reprove them. A Christian's name there! Can one imagine his Master's name to such a petition? But it is for us to abide in Him, that our lives may be like His—pure in themselves, and a blessing to all around them.—United Presbyterian.

APTLY ILLUSTRATED.

An Incident That Portrays the Whole Story of Intemperance.

A few years ago a noted wild-beast tamer gave a performance with his pets in one of the leading London theaters. He took lions, tigers, leopards and hyenas through their part of the entertainment, awing the audience by his wonderful nerve and his control over them. At the closing act to the performance, he was to introduce an enormous boa-constrictor, thirty-five feet long. He had bought it when it was two or three days old; and for twenty-five years he had handled it daily, so that it was considered perfectly harmless and completly under his control. He had seen it grow from a tiny reptile, which he often carried in his bosom, into a fearful monster.

The curtain rose upon an Indian woodland scene. The weird strains of an Oriental band steal through the trees. A rustling noise is heard, and a huge serpent is seen winding his way through the undergrowth. It stops. Its head is erected. Its eyes sparkle. Its whole body seems animated. A man emerges from the heavy foliage. Their eyes meet. The serpent quails before the man—man is victor. The serpent is under the control of the master. Under his guidance and direction it performs a series of frightful feats. At a signal from the man it slowly approaches him, and begins to coil its heavy folds around him. Higher and higher do they rise, until man and serpent seem blended into one. Its hideous head is reared aloft above the mass. The man gives a little scream, and the audience unite in a thunderous burst of applause, but it freezes upon their lips. The trainer's scream was a wail of death agony. Those cold, slimy folds had embraced him for the last time. They had crushed the life out of him, and the horror-stricken audience heard bone after bone crack, as those powerful folds tight ened upon him. Man's plaything had become his master. His slave for twenty-five years had now enslaved him.

In this horrible incident is portrayed the whole story of intemperance. The man who has taken the first glass of intoxicating liquor has the boa of intemperance in his boson. If he throttles the monster now, it is easily done. But if he permits it to live, feeds and nourishes it, he may control it for even twenty-five years, but it is continually growing, and some day its soul-destroying folds will encircle his soul, and bear it to those regions of woe "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." The unchangeable decree of almighty God is: "No drunkards shall inherit the Kingdom of God."—Baptist Weekly.

Drinking and Lying.

There shall be a person born of the most correct parentage in respect to the virtue of truthfulness. That person shall grow up in the perfected practice of the virtue of truth, so that his or her word shall be a password of integrity and honor and right. But by environment that person shall come under the fatal influence of one common, every-day agent, alcoholic drink, and, as the agent changes its victim and masters its victim, the first symptoms of the victory of evil in what is called dipsomania shall of a certainty be the loss of the once pre-eminent virtue. Of the many victims of intemperance whom it has been my misfortune to meet, not one has escaped this moral abasement, departure from truth—the vice of falsehood. It is a part of the moral disease, as distinct and clear as any part of the physical disease—unsteady gait, restless impatience, or palsied speech—which springs from alcohol. It is as if the spirit of untruth had entered the body like a physical poison, had corrupted the mind, and made it a veritable center of sin.—Irish World.

The older brother refused to give back the winnings, and the younger hasn't been anxious to gamble since.

POPULAR MYSTERIES.

Questions Whose Solution Has Taxed the Powers of Many Generations.

"Alas," cried a witty Frenchman, lately, "for the unfortunate man who lives in the twenty-first century! There will be no enchanted, mysterious corner left on the earth for him. Africa and the Arctic circle will be covered with railway stations and summer tourists."

School-boys to-day do not understand how full of mystery the world was to their great-grandfathers. In every continent wide blots on the map were marked "Unexplored Territory." There were five especial mysteries which tormented our ancestors. One was the source of the Nile. "It is highly improbable," says a learned divine of the last century, "that this geographical secret will ever be discovered by man." Another was the truth concerning the lost Atlantes, a fair and fertile country, which tradition said had been engulfed ages ago in the Atlantic Ocean. The center of the earth also gave much uneasiness to curious people. There were many theories concerning it. It was a gulf of liquid fire; it was a mass of ice; it was the abode of the damned; it was a busy, beautiful world, filled with inhabitants, as was the surface of the earth. Books describing this unknown inner continent were published by alleged explorers. Symmes' Hole was the entrance to it, and Symmes told many tales of his adventures underground.

A fourth unsolved mystery was the location of the magnetic pole. Various theories were propounded to explain the attraction of the magnet to the north. One of the most popular of these, three centuries ago, was the existence of a huge monster, which was said to live under the sea near Greenland, toward whom all magnets were, for some inexplicable reason, drawn. Occasionally he raised his head above the ocean, and spouted forth water, which fact rationally explained all tidal waves and water-spouts; the high tides on the Newfoundland coast were produced by the breath from his nostrils.

Another mystery, even yet unsolved, was the sudden, total disappearance of a colony of Danes from the west coast of Greenland. It was conjectured that they had penetrated the sea of ice which covers that country to its eastern coast. There they were still supposed to live, in a tropical climate, amid fruit and flowers. No navigator for three centuries has been able to reach this eastern coast; hence this legend still remains to delight superstitious sailors.

But as these old-time mysteries disappear, others have arisen more profound and close at hand. The nature and quality of the elements, and their relation to each other, open a region of research which will tax the powers of many generations to come. Men for ages told childish tales to each other of genii and enchanted lamps, while the air was full of unusual electricity around them, and steam served only to cook their food. It may be that the commonest substances which we handle to-day may possess tremendous energies that, when understood and trained to the service of man, will change the face of the earth.—Youth's Companion.

THE GAREFOWL'S FATE.

Complete Extinction of the Once Numerous Great Auk Family.

The great auk has become extinct within the last fifty years. At any rate, the general impression of ornithologists is that the bird has disappeared forever, except as specimens are preserved in museums. Prof. Newton, of Cambridge, England, has indulged the belief that the bird may yet be found living about the more inaccessible shores of the North, but the hope has thus far been disappointed.

The fate of this bird is something strange when we consider that it belonged to a family that is numerous and hardy. The divers, of which it was a variety, live about the cliffs of northern shores. Their retreats are rarely visited by man. They have an abundance of food in the fish of the sea. They rear their young on the shelves of the rocks. If they are pursued they easily escape by swimming and diving. Of all the divers none seemed more capable of taking care of itself than the auk. According to Wilson: "Its powers of swimming and diving probably exceeded those of any other species of the feathered race." The wings of the great auk appear to have been so short as to bear the character of paddles, thus resembling the penguin, of which it was the northern representative. It laid its solitary egg—about five inches long and three inches at the greatest breadth—on the bare rock, without any nest. As it was incapable of flight, it had to build on the lower ledges.

A live specimen of the auk was captured off St. Kilda by the tacksman of the Island of Scalpa, and was seen there in the year 1821. While this bird was being indulged with a swim in the sea, restrained by a cord fastened to one leg, it contrived to escape from a subsequent owner.

It has been ascertained that there are about seventy-one skins of the auk and sixty-five eggs in different parts of the world. In 1871 the value of a specimen of the fowl was estimated at not less than about five hundred dollars, but it is now very much greater. An auk's egg is now valued at from fifty to sixty pounds

The eggs vary in size, color and markings, some being of a silvery-white and others of a yellowish-white ground—the spots and streaks also differing in form and color. Within the last few years some admirably manufactured forgeries of these eggs have been offered for sale.—Youth's Companion.

THE PLUM CURCULIO.

How to Exterminate This Destructive and Numerous Parasite.

There seems to be no doubt whatever but what the plum curculio (Conotrachelus nenuphar) can be well nigh exterminated everywhere and regular crops of the stone fruits grown by simply spraying the trees with arsenical poisons (Paris green and London purple) in water; (1) so soon as the buds begin to swell in the spring; (2) two weeks after the petals fall; (3) then after three weeks again, and (4) for perfection, so soon as through blossoming, with a weak kerosene and soap emulsion. This (4) will kill the leaf lice (aphidæ) and plant bugs (hemiptera) that puncture the young fruit and cause it eventually to rot. A Michigan gentleman told me that he had two large, thrifty European plums. "They bloomed freely each year, but the curculio laid her eggs in nearly every plum, and all the fruit that was not wormy rotted before ripening. Spring before last I sprayed the trees thoroughly once with London purple in water about two weeks after the blossoms fell. That season they matured so great a crop of the finest fruit that I was obliged to prop up all the branches. But to my sorrow this large crop so weakened the vitality of my trees that the next spring both were dead. The spraying seemed to kill nearly every curculio, scarcely a fruit showed her ovipositing work, and the plums all ripened without rot." This shows two valuable lessons: (1) Spraying has proven a success, and (2) an overburdensome crop is deathly, especially to a plum.

These sentiments are exactly in line with sense, reason and experience, and especially with our native plums; for these fruits are the natural food plant and breeding place of the plum curculio. This beetle passes the winter in the beetle state, "holed up" like a woodchuck, and emerges in the spring hungry. She at once seeks her natural food plant—these plums—on which to feed, seemingly in preference to all other trees. She usually reaches them before they bloom; therefore just before the blossoms open is the time to spray the trees. But for some reason many of the beetles do not lay their eggs in the fruit until June; hence the necessity of late spraying, for it is possible that these late egg-laying beetles reach the trees late. If the native plums are not within her reach the beetle is forced to accept allied plants of the almond family to which the plum belongs, such as the cherry, peach, apricot, etc., and lay her eggs in their fruits. It is of course possible that the cherries, being so close akin to the plums, they may be as acceptable to her for food as the plums, but it is hardly probable. Therefore it is entirely reasonable that, if we have plenty of native plums in and around our orchards of other fruits, by spraying the plums we will destroy this curculio sufficiently for all practical purposes, and so protect all the other fruits from her destructive work.—D. B. Wier, in American Garden.

CONVERSATIONAL BORES.

Brainless Individuals Who Talk Without Expressing Thoughts.

Conversation among persons who are very intimate should be the best conversation, as no one need speak unless he feels impelled so to do by the stirring of thought within; but the inveterate small-talker has lost the power of distinguishing between the talk that expresses thoughts and the talk that merely articulates sounds. His idea of talking is confined to the practice of "making" conversation; even in argument he passes much time in repeating what has been said in slightly different words; and, when no subject is under discussion, and when he is not gifted with high talents, the grotesque artifices to which he is sometimes reduced would be absurd if they were not so irritating. If he only talked, and said nothing that insisted on answers, he might more easily be forgiven; but this is rarely his way. An irritating small talker, who, though in reality neither deaf nor absent-minded, eked out his speech by insisting on having every thing that was said to him repeated twice, sometimes thrice. I have known to repeat his "What was that you said?" after he had answered the remark that had been made, and when this was pointed out to him he only smiled the satisfied smile of the small talker, who thinks his sins merits, and does not blush to own them. Such a small talker calls these atrocious delinquencies conversational talent, and because it is sometimes necessary to speak idly thinks it is a good deed to do so at all times rather than maintain a wholesome silence. But, indeed, others beside these obvious criminals sin in speaking idly.

Small talk has its uses in expressing indefinite friendliness, though even this would probably be better expressed by some inarticulate sound, if we could only agree on one; but it should never be forgotten that small talk—or talk of no consequence—is in itself of less than no value, and that if on all occasions, except those of necessity, we put our energies to improving our ideas rather than to uttering words; in short, if we talked less and thought more, we and our friends would in all cases be much the better for it.—London Queen.

MAKING BOVINE VIRUS.

How the Animals Are Treated at the New York Vaccine Farm.

Few persons who pass the old two-story brick building, No. 916 Second avenue, which has a decayed wooden awning in front of it and bears the sign, "Steam Carpet Cleaning," are aware that it shelters the Board of Health's vaccine virus "farm." The first floor of the building recently was converted into a stable for cattle that are kept there to undergo vaccination. A cleaner, warmer and better ventilated stable probably can not be found in the city. Sixteen fat cows and Texan steers stood in the stables the other day when a reporter entered the place. Dr. Pardee, the virus expert, was at work in his laboratory in the rear of the stable, while two assistants were looking after the cattle. Dr. Pardee's den is lavishly decorated with colored prints, and is occupied in his absence by a white cat. On the shelves are glass jars containing goose quills and "points" of virus. A big table, on which calves formerly were strapped while undergoing treatment, occupies a part of the room, and there is a small grindstone used for roughening the quills which are to receive the virus.

The manufacture of bovine virus for the protection of human being against small-pox has been going on under the care of Dr. Pardee for a dozen years or more. Formerly he operated on calves, but lately he became convinced that better virus could be obtained from large cattle, and the Health Board decided to give him a new "farm." By a clever arrangement of movable bars in the stalls a cow or a steer is prevented from kicking while it is being vaccinated in a dozen or twenty different places. The operation most annoying to the animal comes later, when the virus is being transferred from it to the quill points. It is necessary for the Health Board to buy the cattle outright, feed them well while undergoing treatment and for some time afterward, and finally sell them to butchers at a loss.

The outlay for rent, feed, salaries, cost of materials and losses in cattle trading amounts to about $10,000 a year. Part of the money comes back through the sale of virus. Last year the department received $2,239 for virus sold to druggists and physicians. Probably money could be made out of the "farm" if the Board of Health charged a fair price for all the virus it could dispose of, but the sanitary officials are mainly interested in stopping small-pox. Last year nearly 90,000 persons in the city were vaccinated free of charge by the sanitary inspectors, and enough virus to vaccinate 30,000 more persons was given away to public institutions. As druggists are charged twenty-five cents for a single "point," the gratuitous vaccinations by the Health Board on that basis last year might be said to be worth nearly $30,000.

"The recent change from calves to large cattle in the virus 'farm' has been attended with surprisingly good results," said President Bayles, of the Health Board. "One inspector recently vaccinated sixty-five children in a public institution with the new virus and vaccination 'took' in every case. Formerly there were frequent failures, and many children had to be vaccinated the second time. The new virus is believed to be as pure as any ever obtained. We have had no complaints about it so far as I have heard. It is alleged that diseases may be communicated to children by humanized virus, but there is no danger in using bovine virus, when the virus is taken from sound cattle."

At present the virus "farm" turns out about 5,000 "points" a week.—N. Y. Tribune.

CRUELTY TO INSECTS.

A Bird in Florida That Impales Bugs and Snakes on Thorns.

Of all the birds in this section there is one that will afford an idler lots of amusement if he will spend an occasional hour watching closely. It is the shrike or butcher bird. A few days ago I was in an orange grove a few rods from the house, where an old darky, with the assistance of a mule, was plowing, and a butcher bird was flying from tree to tree, following up the newly-plowed furrow, looking for insects. Every few minutes he would go to pick up a beetle or insect, and for some time he simply swallowed his victims. After a little he seemed to have had enough to eat and just then a little flock of larks were seen running along in the newly turned furrow, at times almost touching the old darky's heels. Now and then they would come across an insect too large for them to easily manage, and then would begin a little scuffle. Then the butcher bird would swoop down in the center of the little flock, snatch up the insect and fly off with it before the larks knew what had happened. The butcher bird had eaten all he wanted, and so, with the beetle in his beak, he flew to the nearest orange tree, and, selecting a long, sharp thorn, he impaled the insect upon it. I watched this bird put at least ten insects on different thorns. During an hour, besides numerous large insects, the butcher bird captured two snakes, the largest of which was two feet long and very lively. These snakes, although they squirmed and twisted, were taken with difficulty to an orange tree, and after a good bit of hard tugging, they were left with a thorn through their bodies.

When the butcher bird is not looking for food or for victims to stick on thorns, he is generally looking for other birds for the purpose of fighting them, and so he keeps busy from daylight till dark.—Florida Cor. N. Y. Sun.

AN EYE OF FIRE.

One of the Most Wonderful Things Done by the Electric Light.

When it was discovered that an artificial light that very closely resembles the natural light of day could be produced from electricity, and that it could be so easily provided as to take, in a great measure, the place of gas for lighting purposes, every body was naturally astonished and thought that the electricians were the greatest men on earth. The new system was hardly old enough to be an assured success before a lot of wise men began considering the advisability of devoting this light to a greater purpose than that of merely lighting up the humdrum affairs of every-day life.

As an experiment, a small incandescent light was thrust beneath the water in a fountain. The effect was superb while it lasted, but the water managed to work its way into the globe and the light was extinguished. This gave the electricians something to think about, and they began immediately to rack their brains for a means of keeping the water away from the source of light. A coating of rubber was finally placed over the joint where the glass globe joins the brass holder, and over this was drawn a rubber bag that fitted tightly over the top of the globe and around the pipe through which the wire passed. This promised to be successful, but a brief experiment showed that the glass was not strong enough to stand the pressure of water, and after being exposed to it for a short time would collapse. A globe was then made of plate glass that proved able to stand the strain.

For some time this was only used in lighting up fountains by way of an ornament. Then it occurred to Prof. Baird of the United States Fish Commission, that if a light could be used under water it would prove of great advantage to him in his search, for fish that never allowed themselves to be caught by any of the old-fashioned methods. He believed that there existed at a great depth in the ocean various kinds of fish that had never been seen. Every boy who has ever lived near the water knows that a favorite method of catching eels is to lure them within spearing distance by a bright light placed in the bow of a boat. Light not only attracts eels, but every thing else that lives in the water, and the professor was sure that if a light could be made to live at a great depth in the water the reward would be great.

The steamer Albatross, of the commission, was provided with an engine and a dynamo. A liberal supply of heavy glass globes that would hold a light equal to the lighting power of one hundred candles, was placed on board, and equipped with other necessary articles, such as a lot of insulated wire, a large quantity of light, strong rope, and a number of heavy weights to serve as sinkers, the steamer started out. The first attempt was unsuccessful, for at a depth of 1,000 fathoms the pressure was so great upon the globe that it broke. Another trial was speedily made with heavier globes, and they were found able to stand the pressure of any depth to which they could be sunk. But the most wonderful part of this trial trip, which took place something like three years ago, was related to Secretary Frank S. Hastings, of the Edison Electric Light Company, by Prof. Baird.

At a point near the Bahamas, according to the professor, the light was dropped overboard and sunk by means of heavy weights to nearly one thousand fathoms below the surface. On the deck of the vessel stood the crew with nets ready to drop them under the fish that were lured from their homes in the great depth. The light was allowed to remain in the water for some time and then it was slowly raised. It looked like the reflection of a star in the water at first, and its rays were seen, and in them were visible the forms of darting fish. The light soon lit up water for twenty feet around, and a weird assortment of fish that had never before been heard of was seen. When near the surface the entrails of some of these fish burst from their mouths. "The professor ascribed this," said Mr. Hastings, "to the inward pressure. Nature had made them so that they could live in the great depths in which they were found, and when this pressure of the deep water was removed there was a counteracting force that killed them."

The dead fish were just as useful for the purpose for which the professor wanted them as live ones, and he gathered in a great many rare and curious specimens without much trouble. The light was also used to good purpose for discovering the various depths in which different kinds of fish lived.—Chicago Times.

—A moral guide to the stage is said to be a novel invention of a theatre manager. He prints his bills in different colors, indicating the nature of his theatrical wares. For example, a red bill signifies that the play is pernicious; a white bill, that it is moral, and a blue one that it is half-and-half. By this system he says paterfamilias will be able to see at a glance whether he ought to take his sons and daughters or not. The same manager reserves yellow bills for pieces of the Dumas school, as a warning to husbands to beware of what may happen should they let their wives go.

—Any man with a fair education and good imitative faculties can pass himself off for a lord, count, earl, marquis, or bishop, and nothing but positive identification can expose him. It is different with a woman. Whatever she is naturally will come out the first time she gets mad.

DINING ITINERANCY.

How a Southern Gentleman Made a Dull Dinner Party Agreeable.

Variety, so they tell us, is the spice of life. And while each of us has, no doubt, been in certain conditions that we think would have been delightful enough to have lasted forever, yet we have many times been placed in conditions where the most sudden change, short of absolute disaster, would have been most welcome. What is more stupid than an uninteresting companion at dinner?—to be compelled to sit through course after course with one in whom you can find no response, with whom there is no common ground of meeting? Evidently a Southern gentleman has found a relief from this state of affairs, if the following incident is correctly reported:

"After the soup had been served, and just prior to serving the next course, the host gave his signal and rose from his seat, as did every other gentleman at the table, all the ladies remaining seated. Each gentleman then moved to the next gentleman's seat to his right. When this was first done, the ladies, not being let into the secret, were very much surprised at the unusual conduct of the gentlemen, and could not at once comprehend the meaning of it; but when they gathered its full intent, and the charm there was in it, it was decidedly gratifying to note the merriment and interest with which they received the innovation. Just prior to the commencement of the next course the host gave his signal again, and each gentleman again moved one gentleman's seat to his right, and so on. The entire setting of the courses was so harmoniously arranged that at the close of the dinner each gentleman had visited, for a short space, every lady at the table, and had at last returned to her whom he had escorted in to dinner."

There might be conditions under which this system of itinerancy would be very embarrassing, if not disastrous.

One would not enjoy having to stop in the midst of expressing a long-cherished sentiment to a most attentive and sympathetic listener; the fortunate companion of an entertaining conversationalist would not enjoy an interruption; the two hearts learning to beat as one would prefer to gaze into each other's faces. But to the unfortunate two who are suspended over the middle ground of indifference or antagonism, what a relief is the host's signal that gives liberty! This custom will not become general, but would it not be delightful to the lion of the evening who is expected to thrill the company by his wit or wisdom? Would he not welcome this opportunity? He could then prepare his set phrases and skillfully lead the conversation into the channels where his little barks would float without the mental effort necessary for a long voyage in which he must guide another's freight.—Christian Union.

EVOLUTION OF EATING.

Some Curious Table Manners of the Good Old Days.

It was late in the fourteenth century when the first evidences of art in the shape of silver cups were noticeable on the buffet. The dishes were made of pewter or wood, and spoons of bone, wood or silver. Knives were rare, and on that account guests invited to feasts carried their own knives. Forks came in general use still later, and for long years after their introduction they were considered ridiculous affectation and foppery, and not nearly so convenient as one's own fingers. The lord and his lady dipped their fingers into the same plate and sipped their wine from the same cup. Even the queenly Elizabeth, with all her elaborate ideas of etiquette, was content to carry her food to her mouth with her fingers, and at first despised the newly invented fork as unseemly and awkward.

Very gradually the dinning-hall grew in comfort and splendor. Dishes of gold and silver were made, and so eager were the nobles for them that they would sacrifice any thing to possess them. The salt-cellar was for a long time the article of highest importance on the board. It was a great affair and stood directly in the center of the table; it was the dividing line; the nobles were seated above the salt, the commoners below; hence grew the proverb: "Below the salt." The passing of salt was a ceremonious custom, the guest throwing a pinch over his left shoulder and murmuring a blessing.

The salt-cellars were of the most curious devices. Sometimes they represented huge animals, sometimes a great, full-blown flower on a long, slender stem, and again they were in the shape of a chariot, mounted on four wheels, on which they were easily run down the table.

The first glass cups came from Venice during the sixteenth century, and from that time on society began to lose many of its primitive ways, and became, in a sense, more refined.

Henry VIII. was born with luxurious tastes; he had his banquet chairs supplied with velvet cushions, and about this time the parlor or "talking room," as it was called, was introduced; and here the dames took refuge when the dinner advanced beyond prudent limits, as it invariably did before the finish.

The cook that presided over the kitchen in those days was not the counterpart of our nineteenth century Bridget, but he was an artist, and generally a man of quality. The ladies of the household, even those of noble birth, attended to many domestic duties, making the bread, preserving the fruits, while to understand the proper use of starch was considered a great accomplishment.—Woman.

Ghastly Relics.

The government will soon have to find new uses for Ford's Old Theatre at Washington. After the assassination of Lincoln public sentiment revolted at the idea that the place should continue to be a play-house. A proposition to transfer the property to the Government was readily entertained by the proprietor. The purchase price was $88,000. Then came the suggestion that it should be turned over to the surgeon-general. It was accepted as peculiarly fitting; and thus the building in which the President received his mortal wound became the store-house for the ghastly records and still more ghastly relics of the army surgeon.

People with weak nerves do not tarry long among the bones and casts. Most visitors are disappointed. They expect something realistic pertaining to the assassination, but the building has been so altered that it requires a pretty strong imagination to turn the interior into a theatre and picture the scene of that terrible April night.

The failure to gratify morbid curiosity by the preservation of the interior, or part of it, in the condition it was the night of the assassination has been partially atoned for. All these years there has been on exhibition in the corner above where the President sat that fatal night a little glass case containing three pieces from a human backbone. The sections rest one upon another. Between the first and second, as they stand, there is a jagged hole, showing where a bullet struck. This "specimen" was once part of the living body of J. Wilkes Booth, the assassin of Mr. Lincoln.

The three vertebræ are nearly all of the remains of the mad actor which have not crumbled to dust. A small bottle, such as surgeons use to preserve specimens in alcohol, goes with the portion of Booth's backbone. A clot of grayish-looking matter floats in the preserving liquid. It is the part of the spinal cord which was struck by Boston Corbett's bullet when Booth received his death wound in the burning barn on the Garrett plantation, near Bowling Green, Va., eleven days after the assassination. Lincoln and Booth were shot in very nearly the same portion of the body. The ball in each case entered near the base of the brain. In Lincoln's case the nerves were paralyzed and no pain was suffered. Booth's torture, until death came, was the most severe that could have been devised. People gaze and gaze at the two specimens, after they learn what they are, and go away satisfied. Of late years there has stood near the Booth relics a jar which possesses almost equal interest with its neighbors. It contains the spleen of Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield.

Reminiscences of the Indian wars are numerous. There is the skull of one Apache brave who only succumbed when he had been sabered nine times. At least that must be the conclusion, for the cranium shows nine distinct penetrating cuts from the sword. Of course, it is not to be supposed that the white man amused himself by whacking away needlessly at the red man's head after the latter was hors de combat. The skull belonged to an Arancanian, who was killed by Chilian soldiers.

The skull of the favorite squaw of Little Bear, the Indian chief, is a very good companion piece to the above. She was killed in Wyoming. In the preserved cranium are seven bullet holes.

Some of the wonderful accomplishments of the Indians with their arrows are illustrated in a very realistic manner. These arrows had heads made of the iron hoops of barrels. These may be taken between the fingers and bent with ease, they are so thin; but shot from the bow by the Indians they went through obstacles which would have stopped a bullet. They penetrated bones without fracturing them and they made cuts as clean as the keenest surgical blades. The Apache arrowhead of soft iron has pierced where a leaden projectile would have flattened.

The skull, with an arrow point driven into it almost to the head, is a reminiscence of an Indian attack on a stage in Western Texas. Three United States soldiers were the guard. One was killed outright, one escaped and the third crawled away through the grass with this arrow point sticking in his brain, a bullet hole through an arm, another through a leg, and a third chunk of lead in his breast. This man lay in the grass until the Indians had disappeared, and then he made his way afoot 160 miles over the plains of Texas. The stage was attacked on the 1st of September, 1870, and seven days later the man limped up to Fort Concho. He was still in possession of his mental faculties, but he died on the 19th of September, ten days after entering the hospital. When the post-mortem was held the surgeons found that the arrow point had gone straight through the bone and into the brain, making a wound, which under ordinary conditions, would be considered sufficient to cause immediate death. Alongside of the skull is shown a piece of the stage door, of hard wood, with another arrow head sticking in it.

Some people may think this a rather incredible story, but there are plenty of things in the Army Medical Museum to show that exceptions exist to the ordinary laws of mortality. A broken neck usually kills. There is exhibited a skull with the spinal column attached, which came from the Catacombs of Paris. Any surgeon can see that the column was broken where it reaches the head and that the parts mended themselves before death came. The United States has furnished one case of this kind, and the evidence is shown here in the dislocated vertebræ grown together again.

A miscellaneous assortment in a case containing a "giant" skeleton includes a piece of the hip of a soldier in the 8th New Jersey, which makes an interesting specimen, because the owner of it got well enough afterward to carry the hod. He laid in the hospital eleven months, however. The bone was taken out in May, 1864, and it was April, 1865, when the patient waked. No. 1335 is a large bone with the splintering about midway where the bullet struck. The tag says: "Maj.-Gen. D. E. S., United States Volunteers, Gettysburg, July 2; amputated in the lower third of the thigh by Surgeon T. Sim, United States Volunteers, on the field. Stump healed rapidly, and subject was able to ride in carriage July, 16; completely healed, so that he mounted his horse in September, 1863. Contributed by the subject." It is the leg of Gen. Sickles, who is still cheerfully stumping about New York and Washington.

The bones are much more agreeable to look upon than casts. There is some satisfaction in seeing a man was seven feet high in life wholly undressed, particularly when his bones are bleached glistening white and the joints and attachments are of bright metal.

Good for Great Britain.

The Washington Republican said Tuesday that information has been received in that city in regard to a gigantic Anglo-American commercial scheme in which several American millionaires, the Rothschilds, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Westminister and others, are said to be concerned.

It has been ascertained that the promoters propose to erect granaries, warehouses, a pork curing establishment, and a cheese and butter factory on sites convenient to several great lines of railroad leading into Chicago. All kinds of American produce, such as flour, bacon, cheese, butter and fruits of every description as well as live stock, are to be carried to Chicago and then by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to New York. A bridge will be built connecting the main land with Staten Island where large docks will be constructed by a syndicate of capitalists from New York. The produce of the United States will be carried by steamers specially built for the company and landed at Barrow in Furness, England. The Duke of Devonshire is the principal proprietor of the land in this district besides being president of the Furness railway.

At Barrow the company proposes building alongside the docks abattoirs for slaughtering cattle immediately after landing, also tanneries for preparing hides and factories for making oleomargarine. Large warehouses are also to be erected at Barrow and thence the food products will be distributed throughout Great Britain by means of retail stores which will be opened in all the leading towns in order to supply consumers direct without incurring any middlemen's charges.

The capital to be invested in the enterprise will, it is said, amount to many millions of dollars. Agents have been sent to this country and are now making necessary arrangements to commence operations in the spring.

Wickedness in Brazil.

Sabbath in Para is a holiday, and not a holy day in any sense. Beside the daily morning mass, very seldom is there any service in the Roman Catholic church. Sunday morning many of the women attend this mass; but the men almost universally stay away; some remain at home to work, but many more devote the day to drinking and the game. Those who wish to spend the day more quietly visit friends or take their families to Marco de Legua, a much frequented resort three miles from the centre of the city, reached by both horse and steam car. Steam cars only run to this resort, however, upon the Sabbath and other public holidays. In the evening twelve large churches, one of these the massive cathedral of the bishop, have closed doors, with both theatres, with a seating capacity of at least 4,000, are crowded to their utmost. Gambling dens and billiard and drinking saloons all do a thriving business, while the harlot watches at her window for the footsteps of the passer-by.—Rev. A. C. Smith in New York Christian Advocate.

When Attacked by Pneumonia.

"What is the first symptom of pneumonia?" was asked of a New York physician.

"A severe chill," was the reply.

"What ought a man to do who is seized with such a chill?"

"He should get into a bath tub containing hot water—so hot that it would redden the skin—and stay there as long as he can."

What is the philosophy of such treatment?"

A severe chill, which always precedes pneumonia, indicates that the blood has gorged the lungs, liver or kidneys. Now, the first remedial step is to dissipate this blood. A hot bath does this. It draws the blood to the surface, and dissipates it over a greater area. After having lain in the bath until relief is experienced the patient should step out of it and wrap himself in a woolen blanket. Don't stop to dry yourself with a towel, but wrap the warm wool around you and tumble into bed

"The consensus of opinion among the leading physicians of the day, is that pneumonia is an infectious disease. That is, the disease germ is in the air, and when the right physical condition is presented the germ takes root and fructifies. The popular idea that pneumonia is confined to cold weather in an erroneous one. There is no pneumonia in the Arctic regions. It is mainly due to the sudden changes in our temperature. By consulting the health reports of New York city it will be found that the highest death rate occurs in December and February, but that there are a good many cases in August."

Col. Smith, who writes for the Atlanta Constitution under the name of "Bill Arp," is a farmer in Georgia. He gives the following reasons for being a Protectionist: "You know I was an old-fashioned Democrat, brought up to believe in Free Trade and sailors' rights. I am now; but something has happened. I own a little farm near Cartersville. I used to gather my corn and sell it in Atlanta for whatever they would give. I had some pasture land for my stock and I raised wheat, vegetables and fruit in a small way. What we could not consume was wasted. When the tariff went into operation old Joe Brown started some iron developments near by, and the Cartersville Station became quite a village. Before I left home I sold seventeen loads of hay. Buyers didn't bargain for it, but came and took all I could spare at my own price. I havn't sold a bushel of corn in several years. Those fellows come and buy it by the dozen for roasting ears. It's so with everything that grows on my land. I cannot raise as much wheat as they want. I'm in favor of the thing that did it, so I'm a Protectionist.

"You will come to our fair to-morrow evening, Mr. Sampson, of course?" she said, with a bewitching smile, "and you must bring lots of money with you."

Mr. Sampson was so overcome by the smile that he was on his knees before he knew it, and presently everything was as it should be.

"George, dear," the girl said later on, and she said it thoughtfully, too, "perhaps it will be as well for you not to bring too much money to-morrow evening. We ought both to practice economy now, you know."

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day, The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

THE Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright. It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.

O, Wilhelmina, Come Back.

Personal—Will the young woman who edited the gravy department and corrected proof at our pie foundry for two days, and then jumped on the evening that we were to have our clergyman to dine with us, please come back, or write to 32 Park Row, saying where she left the crackers and cheese.

Come back, Wilhelmina, writes Bill Nye, in the New York World, and be our little sunbeam once more. Come back and cluster around our hearthstone at so much per cluster.

If you think best we will quit having company at the house, especially people who do not belong to your set. We will also strive, O, so hard, to make it pleasanter for you in every way. If he had known, four or five years ago that children were offensive to you, it would have been different. But it is too late now. All we can do is to shut them up in a barn and feed them through a knot-hole. If they shriek loud enough to give pain to your throbbing brow, let no one know, and we will overcome any false sentiment we may feel towards them, and send them to the Tombs.

Since you went away we can see how wicked and selfish we were, and how little we considered your comfort. We miss your glad smile, also your Tennessee marble-cake and your slat-pie. We have learned a valuable lesson since you went away, and it is that the blame should not have rested on one alone. It should have been divided equally, leaving me to bear half of it and my wife the other half.

Where we erred was in dividing up the blame on the basis of tenderloin steak or peach-cobbler, compelling you to bear half of it yourself. That will not work, Wilhelmina. Blame and preserves do not divide on the same basis. We are not now in favor of what may be called a sliding scale. We think you will like this better.

We also made a grave mistake in the matter of nights out. While young I formed the wicked and pernicious habit of having nights out myself. I panted for the night air, and would go a long distance and stay out a long time to get enough of it for a mess, and then bring it home in a paper bag, but I can see now that it is time for me to remain indoors, and give young people like yourself a chance, Wilhelmia.

So if I can do anything evenings while you are out that will assist you, such as stoning raisins or neighboring windows, command me. I am no cook, of course, but I can peel apples or grind coffee, or hold your head for you when you need sympathy. I could also soon learn to do the plain cooking, I think, and friends who come to see us after this have agreed to bring their dinners.

There is no reason why harmony should not be restored among us and the old sunlight come back to our roof-tree.

Another thing I wish to write before I close this humiliating personal. I wish to take back my harsh and bitter words about your singing. I said that you sang like a shingle-mill, but I was mad when I said it, and I wronged you. I was maddened by hunger, and you told me that mush and milk was the proper thing for a brain-worker, and you refused to give me any dope on my dumpling. Goaded to madness by this, I said that you sang like a shingle-mill, but it was not my better nature that spoke. It was my grosser and more gastric nature that asserted itself, and I now desire to take it back. You do not sing like a shingle-mill, at least so much as to mislead a practiced ear.

Your voice has more volume, and when your upper register is closed is mellower than any shingle-mill I ever heard.

Come back, Wilhelmina. We need you every hour.

After you went away we tried to set the bread as we had seen you do it, but it was not a success. The next day it came off the nest with a litter of small, sallow rolls which would easily resist the action of acids.

If you cannot come back, will you please write and tell me how you are getting along, and how you contrive to insert air-holes into home-made bread.

One of our Western exchanges says that a practical revivalist requested all in the congregation who paid their debts to rise. The rising was general. After they had taken their seats a call was made for those who didn't pay their debts, and one solitary individual arose, who explained that he was the editor, and could not because the rest of the congregation were owing him thier subscriptions.

Some Saxon Customs.

It seems somewhat paradoxical, perhaps, to use the term table manners about a people who had no tables strictly speaking, but a board that, when required, was brought out from its place of storage and placed upon trestles, and on this, after covering with a piece of carpet or tapestry, the meal was placed. From this source comes our word "boarder;" one who sits at our board to eat, but who is not of the family.

The salt-cellar was the most important article upon the table. It was very large, made with a cover, and when the host could afford it, was of solid silver elaborately chased. It occupied the place of honor on the table, and the most distinguised guests sat above it. Thus "to sit below the salt" shows the position of an inferior.

The meats were brought in on spits, just as they were cooked, and in that way passed around by the servants to the guests, who in the more barbarous times tore off a portion as best they could. When they were a little further advanced in civilization there was a carver who held the meat in one hand while he cut with the other. The guests helped themselves, using their hands, throwing the bones and refuse to the dogs and casts, of which there was a goodly number, and which scrambled for their share among the rushes. A few had knives shaped like razors, but forks were unknown. Even the great Elizabeth ate with her fingers. In her reign, however, commerce was extended and luxuries began to appear; porcelains and glasses to drink from instead of pewter mugs. In her bath-room she had mirrors, and this was considered a great extravagance.

At first, two persons ate from one "trencher." The trenchers were nothing more than a huge slice of bread. Two qualities of bread were made; one fine, to be eaten; the other of coarse, inferior flour, which was cut in substantial slices and used as plates. After the meal was ended, if the guest or member of the family was unusually hungry he was at liberty to eat his plate, which was found to be quite palatable in consequence of having soaked up the gravy; if he did not choose to devour it, it was placed in the alms-basket, which was always to be found in the dining hall and into which was gathered the broken food and sent out to the poor, waiting at the gate.

When plates first came into use the rich provided themselves with handsome silver ones, while the poorer classes had to be content with those made of pewter or wood.

Every one had his drinking horn or cup. Usually it was a horn elaborately carved or ornamented with gold and silver, and considered a very valuable article among a man's possessions. The drinking horn was often left by will, as in later times people bequeated snuff boxes and as now they might dispose of a valuable watch or diamond ring.

In the transfer of land, before the custom of witnessing by seal was introduced, the owner gave something in pledge as an assurance or token of the contract, and in such cases it was not uncommon to make use of the drinking horn for this purpose. One family held their estate from Canute by his drinking horn. This was their sole proof. One can get from this fact an idea of the value which was attached to this article of personal property. Probably the expression "taking a horn" could be traced back to the use of this form of drinking utensil, for they were so fashioned, as were the first drinking glasses also, that they could not be placed in an upright position, therefore it became necessary as soon as they were filled to swallow their contents at once. From their propensity to tumble over is said to have come our word "tumbler," as applied to a drinking glass.

They were seated in the balcony, and he, the ardent and romantic lover, was breathing impassioned sentiment into the ears of the peerless but practical Priscilla.

"How sweet to me is the scent of roses!" he murmured in his thrilling tones. "The perfume of that queen of flowers affects me strangely, agitates me, nay, even forces the tears into my eyes!"

And Pegasus would have soared to even greater heights had she not brought him to earth with the common-place comment:

"Well, do you know, I've noticed the same thing about onions!"

Soap Versus Law.

A Missouri constable rode out to a farm near St. Joe armed with a subpena for a woman who was wanted as a witness in a case in court. He found her in the back yard busily engaged in stirring a boiling, bubbling, mass in a large brass kettle, He stated his business and she said:

"I can't go to-day."

"But you must."

"What's the hurry?"

"Why, court's in session and the case is now on trial. They want you by noon."

"Well, I ain't going. You think I'm going off and leave this hull kittle o' saft soap to spile, jist to please your old court? No, sirree!"

"Why, my dear madam, you must. You really dont seem to understand——"

"I understand that I've got a big kittle o' splendid soap grease on to bile, and it'll make thin, sticky soap if it ain't finished to-day. You go back and tell the jedge so."

"You'll be fined for——"

"Pooh! I'd like to see the Missoury jury that'd fine a woman for not leaven' soap-bilin' when it was at a critical p'int, as one might say, Tell the jedge I'll come to-morrow if we don't butcher our peegs then; an' if we do, I'll come some day next week,"

"But I tell you that won't do. You must come now."

"Lookee, young man, you think I'm a fool? I reckon you never made any soap, did you? If you had, you'd know that——"

"What does the jedge care about your soap?"

"Well, what do I care 'bout the jedge, if it comes to that? Let the jedge 'tend to his law, an' I'll 'tend to my soap. Law's law and soap's soap. The good book says there's a time for everything, an' this is my time fer a bar'l o' saft soap."

"Well, madam, if you want to be fined for contempt of court, all right. You will be fined sure as ——"

"Bah! I know all bout the law, an' there ain't anything in it, nor in the Constitution of the United States, nor in the Declaration of Injependence, nor in nothing else, that says a woman's got to leave a kittle o' half-cooked soap, and go off to court when she ain't a mind to. I guess I know a little law myself."—Tid-Bits.

Making Russian Sheet Iron.

Probably the only secret process which has been kept inviolate, and for ages openly defied the world of science, is the iron trade of Russia. The secret of making Russian sheet iron is owned by the Government and is such an immense monopoly that it is currently supposed to defray the entire expenses of the Government.

The works constitute an entire city, isolated and fortified against the rest of the world. When a workman enters the service he bids a last farewell to his family and friends, and is practically lost to the rest of the world. He is never heard from afterward, and whether he lives or dies, all trace of him is lost forever.

There have been several desperate attempts made to steal or betray the secret, but in every instance it has resulted in the death of the would-be traitor.

In one case a letter attached to a kite, which was allowed to escape, was picked up by some peasants, and despite their protestations that they were unable to read, they were at once put to death by the guards to whom they delivered the letter, and it was afterward decreed that the guards themselves should pass the remainder of their days within the works.

The wonderful properties of this iron are so well-known that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon them; imitations have been made closely resembling the original article, but the durable polish, toughness and anti-rusting qualities are lacking, and today the secret remains hidden as the philosopher's stone.

It has been recently claimed that a new discovery has been made, which it is believed by some, will develop into the manufacture of an article equally as good, and preparations are now being made to erect large works in this country for its production, but it is too early yet to predict what the results may be.—Ex.

A NEGLECTED GRAVE.

Neglected grave: how soon forgot!
A blackened stone, rank grass, dead leaves,
A narrow mound that ne'er receives
A fond attention, mark the spot
Where one whose name no carving shows,
Lies wrapped in mortal's last repose.

Up yonder hill, years gone apace,
A funeral cortege crept—tears fell
From kindred eyes; a mournful knell
Announced an end to life's swift race.
And now, all those who sorrowed then
In endless peace are here again.

What care the dead if selfish aims
Afford no time for long respect?
If stately shaft or cold neglect
Extol or slight their empty names?
Alas! their usefulness is o'er,
The busy world needs them no more.

But do not we, whose beings thrill
With buoyant life and sturdy powers,
Keep bright the hope in solemn hours
That, when our throbbing hearts are still,
Some faithful friend shall ever keep
A loving vigil o'er our sleep?

A CLEVER WOMAN.

Her Shrewd and Successful Financial Operation.

It was nearly twelve o'clock on a bright spring morning. Yet Colonel Punter was still busily employed in his bachelor rooms in Piccadilly. The Colonel was a fresh-complexioned, somewhat portly man, of about fifty years of age, with grizzled hair and mustache and a vigor of eye and form, which, although he had retired, gave ample evidence that he was blessed with plenty of strength and energy, and would be quite ready for hard service should his country require it of him. On this morning he was correcting the proofs of a pamphlet that was shortly to appear, entitled "The Proper Formations in Savage Warfare." This pamphlet was looked forward to in military circles with a good deal of interest, for Colonel Punter was a very well-known man, and was highly thought of as a scientific soldier. He had been at work on these proofs for two hours, and had just made up his mind that it was time to walk down to his club, when his servant entered the room, and, presenting a card, said that the lady would be very much obliged if Colonel Punter would grant her an interview.

"Certainly," said the Colonel; then glancing at the card he muttered to himself: "Mrs. Verner—I can't remember ever to have heard the name before. I wonder what she wants." Then being a kindly and courteous man, he rose from his writing desk, pushed the proofs away, and took up the newspaper, so that he might not appear to have been interrupted at work. Scarcely had he completed his little maneuver when the door opened and a lady, well but quietly dressed, was shown into the room. She was tall and graceful, and wore a heavy veil, which, however, on the servant's retiring, she threw back, and, holding out her hands, advanced with a smile, saying:

"I am afraid, Colonel Punter, you will have forgotten me."

The Colonel was quite equal to the occasion, and returned her greeting cordially, racking his brains in the meantime to think where he could have seen that beautiful, sad face before. It was the face of a woman about thirty-five years of age, or perhaps a little more, with dark hair and eyes, and an indefinable expression of mirth beneath its sadness, indicating, as it seemed, a lightness of heart which the troubles of the world might have dimmed but could not obliterate. Observing, apparently, the Colonel's somewhat puzzled expression, she continued, gayly:

"I see that, as I expected, I shall have to help your memory. Don't you remember Miss Maud Mervyn, when you were quartered at Dover more than twenty years ago? Why, Colonel Punter, you had just got your company then, and we used to dance together at the Dover balls."

"Give me a moment, Mrs. Verner," he replied; "twenty years is a long time for an old man's memory to go back in a flash."

"Now, don't deny it," continued she, laughing. "I see you don't remember me, but I am not at all offended, for, indeed, how should you? I was a slip of a girl then, and you were, if you will allow me to say so, a man of somewhere about thirty. I, no doubt, was an infinitely insignificant person to you then, as, on the other hand, you were a very important person to me. But, you see, I am obliged to plead our old acquaintance, Colonel Punter, as it is my only excuse for the liberty I have taken in calling on you."

"Excuse of any kind is quite unnecessary," said the Colonel, with a slight bow and smile.

"It is very kind of you to say so," she replied; "and when you have heard my sad story I think you will give me the advice which I have come to ask of you."

"If it is a subject on which I am at all qualified to speak," said he, "I shall be most happy."

"I think it is decidedly your subject, Colonel Punter," she replied, "for it is about my son, who is in the army, that I wish to ask your advice."

"Your son—in the army!" exclaimed the Colonel, with an inflexion of voice that was decidedly complimentary to the youthfulness of her appearance. May I ask his regiment?"

"The Sixtieth Lancers."

"The Sixtieth Lancers!" repeated the Colonel. "Why, Mrs. Verner, I know your son. His commanding officer is an old friend of mine, and I have a slight acquaintance with the whole regiment."

"This is very singular and very lucky," said she. "As you know my poor boy's regiment, I think you will be better able to understand and advise on the troubles and difficulties I am in regarding him. Will you let me tell you my sad story from the beginning, or shall I be boring you?"

"O, pray, don't think so for a moment, Mrs. Verner," said the Colonel; and he would have liked to add: "Nothing you could say would bore me," but felt it would be unsuitable to the occasion.

"Well," she continued with a sigh, "my married life was a short and not a happy one. My husband's health was always bad, and for this reason we had to reside abroad. When we had been married two years my husband died and left me alone in the world with an infant boy." She paused and seemed lost for a moment in sad memories, while the Colonel glanced sympathetically at her, but thought well to say nothing. "Well," she continued, "during the last twenty years I have lived almost entirely abroad, but I sent my son to be educated at Eton, and about two years ago he obtained a commission in the Sixtieth Lancers. Words can not tell what a comfort and joy my son has been to me during my lonely widowhood—I have been so proud of all his school triumphs, I have always been his confidante when he got into trouble. You see, Colonel Punter, I am sadly constrained to use the past tense, for I am grieved to say that since he entered the army his manner to me has gradually changed, until now, when I do see him, which is not often, he who used to be all frankness and love is all coldness and reserve—and if this goes on it will break my heart." Here she fairly gave way and covered her face with her hands. Colonel Punter's soft heart was always much perturbed at the sight of a woman's tears. So he kept murmuring in his most soothing accents:

"Pray, madam, pray, calm yourself. I am sure I will do all I can to help you."

In a few minutes she recovered herself and said:

"You must excuse my breaking down. I know it always vexes a man to see a woman's tears. But I will promise not to do so again, and I dare say you are wondering what you can do to help me in this matter. Well, the fact is, I want to know the worst. I have heard rumors about my son which make me shudder whenever I think of them. I hear that he has given himself out in the regiment as the son of rich people who live abroad, and that he is living in most extravagant style, whereas it is, in truth, with considerable difficulty that his moderate allowance is regularly paid."

"Young scoundrel!" ejaculated the Colonel. Then remembering that a son must never be abused to his mother, added: "I beg your pardon, Mrs. Verner, but for the moment my indignation got the better of me. Besides, these reports are, perhaps, not true. I do not know the affairs of the junior members of the corps sufficiently well to be able to give an opinion on the subject."

"O, I quite understand that; but do tell me what course I had better take," she said, glancing appealingly at him. "How am I, a helpless woman, to find out whether these dreadful reports are true or not? And yet I feel that I must know the truth or go mad."

After a pause, during which the Colonel was evidently lost in thought, he replied: "Mrs. Verner, I promised to do the best I could for you, and I will. I am going down to Aldershot in a few days, and I shall there see Colonel Thompson; from him I will ascertain what reputation for wealth your son has in the regiment. I admit I don't much like the detective part of the business, but I feel that it is a sacred duty to protect a lady in your sad position."

"O, how kind of you, Colonel Punter!" she exclaimed. "This is more than I had any right to expect that you would do for me. But, O, let me beg of you not to expose my son if these rumors should be true, and let me implore you not to seek an interview with him on the subject. If you learn from the Colonel, as you kindly say you will, whether what I have heard is true or not, and would, on your return to town, grant me a few words of advice as to what course I had better take, I should be very grateful."

"I shall be most happy, Mrs. Verner," said he, briskly; "but I feel sure that you will find that there is nothing in it after all. Your son, as far as I know him, is a charming young fellow, and quite incapable of the frauds which these accusations impute to him. So pray keep up your spirits, and, if it is convenient to you, let us arrange to meet here at this time on this day week."

The time was quite convenient to Mrs. Verner, and, with many apologies for the liberty she had taken in calling to ask his advice, she departed.

On his journey down to Aldershot the next morning Colonel Punter thought a good deal about his fair visitor of the day before and her troubles. He heaped, moreover, many hard words on the head of young Verner (for, of course, he supposed him, at any rate, partially guilty). "Selfish young rascals, all the lot of them!" said he to himself; "they don't mind a straw how much trouble they bring on their relations, if only they can indulge themselves, and such a charming woman, too!" And then he went off into a reverie, in the midst of which he found himself speculating as to whether a man of his age was absolutely and irrevocably too old to marry without making himself look like a fool; and as the train arrived at Aldershot he had just come to the conclusion that there was a good deal to be said on both sides.

That very evening he saw Colonel Thompson, and in the course of conversation managed to ask his questions about young Verner, and found out that, according to Colonel Thompson, Verner was the son of a rich merchant in Singapore, and that his people had not been in England for many years.

"Yes, thank you," said Colonel Punter. "I thought I heard of his people in England, but I suppose I must be mistaken," and then he changed the subject. He happened, however, just before mess (he was a guest of the regiment that night), to meet Verner by himself, and he suddenly resolved, in spite of the widow's request, to say a few words to him. So stepping forward and addressing the young man in a somewhat constrained voice, he said: "Would you mind taking a turn with me, as there are a few things I should like to speak to you about?"

"I shall be most happy, Colonel Punter," said the young man, wondering what on earth the old boy had to say to him.

No sooner were they well out of earshot than the Colonel turned short on his companion, and said sternly: "I saw your mother in town yesterday," and then paused to watch the crushing effect of his words. But no crushing effect was visible; on the contrary, Verner answered in accents of mild surprise:

"You must be thinking of some one else, sir; my mother is at Singapore."

"No, I am not thinking of anybody else," said the Colonel, still more sternly; and then added: "So you are going to brazen it out, are you?"

"Brazen what out?" said the young man, apparently thoroughly puzzled.

"You know very well," said the Colonel; "and if you don't, you soon will." Then he turned on his heel and walked off.

Young Verner stood for a moment looking after him; then walked away, laughing heartily.

At mess that night he was heard to say to a brother officer: "You know old Punter, who's here to-night?"

"Yes, replied the other, "I know him pretty well. What about him?"

"He was in India a good deal, wasn't he?"

"Yes. Well?"

"Did he ever get a touch of the sun?"

"Dare say he did; most people do out there."

"Well, if he did, it has affected his brain—poor old boy!"

"What on earth do you mean?"

"Why, I mean that the gallant Colonel may have his lucid intervals, but when he met me, just before mess, he was as mad as a hatter."

"How mad?"

"Well he told me that he had met my mother yesterday in London."

"She's at Singapore, isn't she?"

"Yes, and has been for the last twenty years, and so I told him."

"What did he say to that?"

"He said he saw I was going to brazen it out. I said, 'Brazen out what!' and he retorted, with a scowl, that would have frightened an elephant, that I knew very well. Then he turned and walked off. I could not help laughing at the poor old fellow at the time, he was so desperately serious about it all. However, the sun may do the same for me some day, and I really pity him, for he's a very good chap when he's all right."

"O, a capital fellow," replied the other, "and can tell a very good story. It's really very sad. I suppose it must have been a touch of the sun, though I never heard of his being odd before."

"He seems all right now, any way," said Verner, looking up the table where Colonel Punter was sitting.

"O, yes, he's all right now. I'll tell you what, Verner; I have an explanation. The old boy came down from town by a midday train, and I dare say missed his lunch, and what you took for a madman was only a fellow very much in want of his dinner." And the two young men laughingly changed the subject.

A few days after this the Colonel was back in town, and found himself dreading considerably the coming interview with the widow. He would have to confirm her worst fears, he was afraid; also, that there would be a scene, and he did not like the idea of it at all. He felt, moreover, that he must appear in the light of a bearer of bad news—a melancholy character which he did not by any means wish to assume in Mrs. Verner's eyes. "However," thought he, "I shall at any rate have an opportunity afterward of playing the part of comforter and adviser." And this reflection seemed to cause him a good deal of satisfaction. It will be seen, therefore, that the Colonel had been somewhat taken (to use the word which he employed in confessing it to himself), or smitten with Mrs. Verner on the one occasion on which he had seen her, and during the few days that intervened between his return to town and the day on which they had appointed to have their second meeting he found himself constantly regarding that future date with the mixed feelings which have been described above.

The appointed day and hour found Colonel Punter seated in his room trying to read the paper, but in reality waiting a little nervously for Mrs. Verner. She did not keep him long. On entering the room she looked keenly at the Colonel, and, advancing quickly, said in rapid, anxious accents:

"O, Colonel Punter, don't keep me in suspense; is it true?" Then seeing his blank look, she cried out: "It is, and he is dishonored." Then she sank into a chair and burst into tears. This the Colonel had prepared himself for; so in his most winning accents he implored her to compose herself. This in a few minutes she partially succeeded in doing, and immediately proceeded to cross-examine him as to what he had found out and done at Aldershot; how there was no doubt in the regiment as to young Verner's being the son of rich people at Singapore; how the Colonel himself had told him so, and how he (Colonel Punter) had in a fit of indignation spoken to the young man himself. For this she mildly upbraided him, reminding him of her request, and the Colonel deprecated her wrath and pleaded sudden impulse. When the story was finished she rose, and, smiling sadly through her tears, said:

"I don't know how I can sufficiently thank you for your kindness to me, Colonel Punter. You have indeed been a true friend, and I should like above all things, if you will allow me, to ask your advice as to what I had better do in this sad matter; but, indeed, I feel quite incapable of doing so on this occasion. Hearing that these terrible reports are true has, as you have seen, upset me very much, and I think I had better go home now; but if you will allow me to fix a future interview by note, when I feel less unequal to the effort, you will add one more to your many kindnesses."

The Colonel very readily consented, and in another moment she was gone, and with her, so it seemed to our gallant friend, all light and beauty departed from the room. From that moment, too, though he would hardly have confessed it to himself, he began looking forward to the day when he should see that note upon his table.

A fortnight had elapsed since the interview above detailed, but Colonel Punter had not yet received the expected note. He had not given up hope, but still he was undoubtedly depressed, and, whether it was an effort to throw off this dejection which had induced him to accompany his friend Captain Jones to the Variety Theater, or whether impelled by fate, or for whatever reason, we will not stop to inquire, but at any rate in that theater, and comfortably ensconced in two stalls, sat Colonel Punter and Captain Jones on this evening, some of the events of which are about to be related.

The curtain had just fallen on the first act, and the house, till at that moment wrapped in gloom, sprang suddenly into light. Then, as if by common consent, every man, woman and child in that great audience, with a want of manners that would be permissible nowhere else, but which is quite conventional between the acts of a play, commenced, with or without opera glasses, to scrutinize his or her neighbor. For a few seconds the Colonel had a discussion with his friend as to whether there was time for a cigarette between the acts. This was promptly decided in the negative, and both officers, grasping their glasses, proceeded to join in the "general inspection."

With a calmness born of long habit, Colonel Punter was sweeping the house, when suddenly his arm dropped and his gaze became intently fixed on the occupants of a box on the right of the stage; these consisted of two gentlemen and a lady, and the lady was Mrs. Verner. On this point he had no doubt whatever, though he looked at her with ever-increasing surprise, for she was in very full evening dress, and was extensively bejeweled. She was, moreover, at this moment talking and laughing loudly, not to say boisterously, with her companions, both of whom the Colonel mentally and unhesitatingly pronounced to be cads. At this juncture Mrs. Verner, turning her head suddenly, caught sight of Colonel Punter staring at her from the stalls; the moment their eyes met he bowed, and she also bowed slightly and smiled; then, turning to her companions, she seemed, from their uproarious laughter, to be telling them a more than usually good story. Captain Jones had observed the mutual recognition pass between his friend and the lady in the box, and was greatly astonished.

"Why, Colonel," he said, "do you know her? You don't mean to say that you have had to go to the Hebrews, like younger men?"

"Yes, I know her. But what on earth do you mean by asking whether I've been going to the Hebrews?"

"Well, I think it was a very natural question, under the circumstances."

"I don't know what you are talking about. Who do you think that lady is, then?"

"I don't think at all, Colonel. I know that she's Mrs. Hart Moss, the female representative of one of the biggest money-lending firms in town; and they tell me she's a very good hand at the business."

Colonel Punter made no reply, but became plunged in a deep and apparently distressing reverie, for he clenched his fist and almost ground his teeth, until he attracted the attention of Captain Jones, who had, in the meantime, been nodding recognitions to some people of his acquaintance.

"Why, Colonel," said he, "what's the matter? The sight of that Mrs. Moss seems to have disagreed with you awfully. Whom did you mistake her for?"

"It has disagreed with me," said the Colonel, grimly, "but I see it all now. What you say, Jones, is quite true; she is a very good hand at her business." Then suddenly his countenance brightened somewhat, and he added:

"Come and have something at the club after the play, and, if you will swear secrecy, I will tell you the whole story."

And he did tell Captain Jones every detail, finishing the narrative with these words: "So you see she made a regular catspaw of me, in order to find out if Verner was worth powder and shot. I suppose, as his people live abroad, she found difficulties in the ordinary methods of procedure."

"I expect that you're about right, Colonel. By Jove! she's a clever woman!"

"I wonder she had the audacity, though," said our gallant friend, his anger boiling up again for a moment. "Why, I might make the whole matter public."

"She knew you wouldn't, though."

"And she's quite right," said the Colonel, "for I won't.—Cornhill Magazine.

SIDE-TRACKED IN LIFE.

Why Young People Should Study Their Own Aptitudes.

A Boston paper lately published a number of interviews with men who had become "side-tracked" in life.

By this is meant men, though willing to work, yet were unable to find anything congenial to do.

They were men who had somehow got out of the current of the great forces in which the world is moving, and were stranded, as it were, like helpless hulks along the sands of time. There are more such men and women in every community than most people imagine.

Perhaps the most numerous class of men who get side-tracked are those who start in life in an occupation for which they have no natural aptitude. There are thousands of farmer boys who never should remain on the farm—the loud protestations of the agricultural press to the contrary notwithstanding. There are, doubtless, men who make a life business of stirring the soil when they ought to be stirring the Senate; and, on the contrary, perhaps, there are men who are trying to stir the Senate who ought to be stirring the soil. Good business men are frequently spoilt to make poor preachers; and there are many large and heavy lawyers who would make ideal blacksmiths; and there are some slender and unsuccessful blacksmiths with the keen logical brain and the shrewd masterful mind of the lawyer. Such men are side-tracked for life, unless there is some great event crosses their track, such as crossed the track of Grant the teamster, or Cromwell the country squire. But no doubt there are many Grants who always team, and many Cromwells who never leave the farm. There are many men who start out in life, like hunters, on the wrong trail. They never bring down their game because their game has gone in another direction. They are like fishermen, who bob for cod in a trout brook, or start a-whaling on an inland pond.

There are some men who are side-tracked for life at their very birth. They are born into a mesh of circumstances from which there is no extrication. Of course it is easy enough to say that a man, like water, will always find his level; but it is hard for water to rise plumb with its fountain-head when confined in an underground pipe. It would have been difficult for Shakespeare to assert his claim to immortality if he had been born in Patagonia, and we would never have heard of Plato if he had first seen the light in Scythia. To say nothing of the hereditary influences that mold the unborn man, the environment of the young human's infancy usually shapes and directs his destiny, so irrevocably that only men of the strongest will and the toughest mental and physical fiber can ever counteract the impetus that is given them in childhood. To be sure there are a few who

> Burst their birth's invidious bar,
> And grasp the skirts of happy chance,
> And breast the blows of circumstance,
> And grapple with their evil star.

but men of such heroic breed are always so few that they are perpetually a source of special wonder.

The lesson that young people should gain from all this is the importance of studying their own aptitudes. In choosing a profession do not consult your egotism, but your personal fitness; and if the surroundings of your birth are unfavorable to your fullest development, overcome them as much as possible by the indomitable stubbornness of your own will. To do this, learn to think for yourself at as early an age as possible, and you will soon learn that a man well intrenched within himself is able to rise above the repressions and contracting force of circumstances. Above all things do not get side-tracked at the start.—Yankee Blade.

Farming as a Business.

There are some among our readers who, we fear, think farming an exceedingly profitable business, and that any one can make money at it. This is a great mistake, as many have found to their sorrow. We do not wish to mislead any one by giving results of crops obtained under peculiarly favorable circumstances. Farming, like every other calling, has its advantages and its disadvantages. When properly conducted, it will yield a good living, and possibly something more. No one should expect to get rich suddenly in this business. It is a healthful, and in many respects independent and pleasant employment, and one worthy the attention of men of brains. It is not now true, if it ever was, that every dunce can get a better living by farming than by any other occupation. We do not wish to discourage those who are thinking of farming for a life-work, nor, on the other hand, are we willing to glorify it so as to mislead. It is our desire to impress upon all our farmer friends the importance of so conducting their business as to secure the very best results.—Congregationalist.

"Purgatory Bullets."

An excited Irishman lately rushed into a Boston drug store, having a "broken-up" appearance generally. "Be jabbers!" he yelled, "I'm all wrong entoirely. I want some shtuff to straighten me out. Some o' thim 'Purgatory Bullets' will fix me, I'm thinkin'. What d'ye tax for thim!" "What do you mean? asked the clerk. "Purgatory Bullets, sor, or somethin' loike that, they call thim," replied the man. "Shure, I'm in purgatory already, with headache, and liver complaint, and bad shtomach, and the divil knows what all." The clerk passed out a vial of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, and Pat went off contented. These little Pellets cure all derangements of liver, stomach and bowels. Sugar-coated, little larger than mustard seeds, and pleasant to take. Druggists.

Shall Women Be Allowed to Vote?

The question of female suffrage has agitated the tongues and pens of reformers for many years, and good arguments have been adduced for and against it. Many of the softer sex could vote intelligently, and many would vote as their husbands did, and give no thought to the merits of a political issue. They would all vote for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, for they know it is a boon to their sex. It is unequaled for the cure of leucorrhea, abnormal discharges, morning sickness, and the countless ills to which women are subject. It is the only remedy for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. Does the Earth Really Move?

Science says that it does, but we can not help wondering sometimes if there isn't some mistake about it, when we see how stubbornly certain old fogies cling to their musty and antiquated ideas. It was believed once that consumption was incurable, and although it has been clearly demonstrated that it is not, thousands of old-time physicians close their eyes and put their hands to their ears and refuse to abandon the theory. But for all that the world moves on, and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery continues to rescue sufferers from consumptives' graves. It is a sure cure for this dreaded disease, if taken in time. All scrofulous diseases—and consumption is included in the list—yield to it.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Growing animals need more food in proportion to their weight than those that are full grown.

—Spinach is one of the early greens. An application of a very fine manure will hasten them and give a larger crop.

—Those who have experienced the misery of chilblains will be glad to try bathing the afflicted parts in a pint of vinegar containing five cents' worth of turpentine.

—Golden Pudding: Mix well one-quarter of a pound each of flour, bread crumbs, sugar and finely minced meat; and the same quantity of orange marmalade and one egg; pour into a well-buttered mold and steam two and a half hours.

—Vegetables with a strong flavor, such as onions and turnips, will be much improved by putting them to boil in cold water, renewing this from a kettle of boiling water as soon as it comes to a scald.—Good Cheer.

—The only way to continue bearing apple trees healthy, vigorous and fruitful, is by giving them full possession of the land, good cultivation, and supplying a sufficient quantity of manure to keep up the fertility of the soil. The neglect to keep these requirements is the main cause of the premature decay of many of our old orchards.

—The customary remedy for the black knot or blight on plum trees is to cut it out as fast as it appears and burn it. This is laborious and not always satisfactory. A Yankee fruit-grower reports that painting the diseased spots as soon as they appear with linseed oil, has been a sure preventive in his experience.—Farm and Home.

—The very best thing for a sprain is to put the limb into a vessel of very hot water immediately, then add boiling water as it can be borne. Keep the part immersed for twenty minutes, or until the pain subsides; then apply a tight bandage and order rest. Sometimes the joint can be used in twelve hours. If necessary use a silicate of sodium dressing.

—Sausage Rolls: Take puff paste, roll out to an eighth of an inch in thickness; then cut in squares of four inches each, lay them on a board; have sausage meat ready, make in small rolls, and place one on each square of pastry. Wet the edges and bring them together. Work with beaten white of an egg, bake nice and brown. If properly made these rolls are very dainty.

—Ham and Potatoes: Beat the yelks of two eggs into a little melted butter (about two ounces), cut some thin slices of cooked ham; dip them in it; butter a dish or pan, and lay in it a layer of cold boiled and sliced potatoes, sprinkle them with pepper and salt, then put a layer of the pieces of ham, another of potatoes, and so on till the dish be full, finishing with the potatoes. Pour over this half a pint of cream, stand the dish in the oven and bake quickly.—Yankee Blade.

WATCH THE PIGS.

How to Raise Healthy and Consequently Profitable Porkers.

The best possible floor for a piggery is one of earth, provided this is of a kind that will not become too dusty. Hogs seem to be peculiarly sensitive to dust, or, rather, since they have their nostrils oftener and closer to the ground than any other domestic animal, they inhale more dust than any other. It is very injurious to them, causing snuffles, cough, influenza, thumps, etc. The occupation of one bed for a long time unchanged is a fruitful cause of disease; even the earth, which purifies all things, will itself become foul at last from the exhalations of the skin. Hogs seem to be peculiarly sensitive in their skins and the mucous membrane lining all the internal cavities. They suffer from a lack of cleanliness, and no animal will show it sooner in the toused and dead look of the hair; whereas a hog that is in good thrift will very soon give unmistakable evidence of it in the clean, soft, bright appearance of his hair and bristles.

As above stated, an earth floor is the best every way, but this should not be allowed to become so dry as to yield excessive dust, nor so damp as to produce a steamy, reeking condition in the nest, which also is very productive of colds and cough. A floor of clay is good as against the first objection; it does not tend excessively to dust. I have bedded hogs on a layer of earth thrown on a tight board floor a foot or so above the ground, and this will prevent dampness, but is objectionable on account of the propensity of rats to harbor in it. Rats and unringed hogs are exceedingly destructive to a board floor. Every precaution should be adopted to exclude these odious vermin. Their constant running and squealing disturb hogs not a little, to say nothing of the thieveries they perpetrate. I have even suspected them of devouring very young pigs. If I were about to build a hog pen now, after years of experience, I should try at least one compartment of it with a brick or stone floor laid tight in cement, as a foundation for the layer of earth for them to rest in. This would prevent the foul and pernicious dampness that would arise by capillary attraction from the ground beneath, and it would exclude rats.

Let me repeat: If the farmer will carefully watch his pigs and completely renovate their straw, once a week at the outside, he may with safety give it to them for nesting; otherwise not. With the best of intentions toward my swine, I never could bear it in mind to change their bedding often enough; and there is hardly anything more pernicious to them than a pile of evil-smelling, polluted straw. It is positive poison to them.—Stephen Powers, in Ohio Farmer.

AGASSIZ AND DICKENS.

Something About the Mothers of These Two Famous Men.

Concerning many of those women the world knows much, but of the majority it is ignorant. The mother of Agassiz, the scientist, was the wife of a Swiss Protestant clergyman, and lived to a good old age. Louis was her favorite son, and she trained him with the greatest care. When, in 1857, Professor Silliman, of Yale College, visited her, he found her at fourscore a "tall, erect and dignified woman, with animated address and cultivated manners." When she was assured by her guest that her son's adopted country loved him, and was proud of him, her strong frame was agitated, her voice trembled with emotion, and the flowing tears told the sad story of a mother's heart.

The day that Professor Silliman left she walked a long way in the rain to bid him and his wife farewell. Presenting them with a little boquet of pansies, she bade them tell her son her "pensees were all for him." Pensee, in French, means both pansies and thought. On the fiftieth birthday of Agassiz the Saturday Club, of Boston, celebrated it with a dinner at which Longfellow, Holmes and Lowell read poems. In the poem of the former, allusion was made to the natural mother as mourning over the fact the great mother, Nature, had driven her son from the fireside, where she wished to keep him:

> And the mother at home says "Hark!
> For his voice I listen and yearn:
> It is growing late and dark,
> And my boy does not return."

Agassiz' head was bent during the reading of the poem, but when the allusion to his mother was made his ruddy face flushed with restrained feeling, tears gathered in his eyes, and as the last line was uttered they dropped slowly down his cheeks, one after another.

The childhood of Dickens was so shadowed by poverty, and his sensitive and imaginative mind was so keenly alive to his position, that it was hardly possible that he could draw an absolutely impartial picture of his parents. His mother had a keen appreciation of the droll and of the pathetic, and likewise considerable dramatic talent. She was a comely little woman, with handsome, bright eyes, and a genial, agreeable person.

From her Dickens undoubtedly inherited his temperament and intellectual gifts. She possessed an extraordinary sense of the ludicrous, and her power of imitation was something astonishing. Her perception was quick, and she unconsciously noted everything that came under her observation. In describing ridiculous occurrences her tone and gesture would be inimitable, while her manner was of the quaintest. Dickens declared that to her he owed his first desire for knowledge, and his earliest passion for reading was awakened by his mother, who taught him not only the rudiments of English, but also a little of Latin. Poverty saddened and darkened many years of her life, and her children were early compelled to leave her and earn their own living, but they all honored and loved her as she deserved.—Woman's Argosy.

CHARACTER STUDIES.

To Learn a Man's or Woman's Disposition Watch Them Eat.

There is no better place to study human nature than the average hotel dining-room. If character doesn't show out when a man is hungry, there probably isn't any. Good breeding, however, shows even more quickly, and though it may not be altogether pleasant to watch the man next to you eat a whole dish of green peas with his knife, it is a curious and interesting sight.

A thin little woman leading four children came into the supper-room of one of the city hotels last week. There were three boys and one girl and they were probably included between seven and thirteen years of age. They had evidently been traveling and the children, though not used to public dining-rooms, all had children's appetites. Each one demanded a bill of fare and studied it eagerly. There was a moment's silence and then——

"Ma, I want some strawberries and a Bath bun and—and a banana."

"Ma, I want some turkey and pumpkin pie."

"Ma, ma, do they have bear steaks?"

"I don't know, my son—Willie, stop reaching for the butter, and put down that knife."

Here a commotion arose owing to a dispute between the eldest boy and the one next, relative to the changing of their order to "golden buck," the second boy contending that it would be better to order all mince pie, because they knew what that was.

"Ma, what's a canvasback duck?"

"It's a kind of wild duck."

"What does it have canvas for, to put up when it rains?"

Here the waiter, having prepared ice-water all around, assumed a receptive attitude, and the thin woman said: "We just want a light supper. The children are not hungry," she explained, "and it isn't good for them to eat much before going to bed. You might bring some buttered toast, tea and stewed prunes, two portions of each will do."

And then eight sad, young eyes, from which the light of pie and turkey had faded, followed the waiter as he vanished toward the kitchen.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE NEVER-REST CURE.

Beneficial Effects of Regular Muscular Exercise and Recreation.

As there are many degrees of nervous exhaustion, so are there many methods of restoration. What would be pleasant exercise to one might prove laborious exertion to another, and what might be soothing to one might be irritating to another. In all cases, however, complete nerve rest implies the maintenance of agreeable sensation and the avoidance of nervous agitation. It may not be possible to obtain such absolute rest as is here indicated, but the aim of treatment is to secure as near an approach to it as can be attained by legitimate means. No means are used which might injure the general health.

The fact that women are more liable than men to the severer forms of nervous exhaustion is one reason why the cases quoted in these pages are chiefly those of women. Another reason is that, in men, it is rarely possible to study this stage of the disease uncomplicated by the effects of alcoholic indulgence. Most men who find themselves becoming victims of nervousness endeavor to escape the worries of life by taking refuge in drink; so they usually bring upon themselves other diseases of alcoholic origin. In women this was not formerly the habit, but there is reason to believe that the late increase of inebriety among them is largely due to the spread of nervous exhaustion. On the other hand there are many cases in both sexes where alcoholic indulgence has undoubtedly been the chief cause of the ailment.

Although the most severe forms of this disease have alone been discussed, it must not be supposed that milder forms do not also require special nerve rest. This can not be secured without more or less change being made in the ordinary mode of life. Nervous agitation is the chief cause of nervous exhaustion. It is almost impossible even for a healthy man to avoid a certain amount of agitation in connection with his affairs, while for the nervous man it is absolutely impossible. For the latter, therefore, a frequent holiday is essential. The way of spending such a holiday is a matter of urgent importance.

Many nervous sufferers return home worse than when they left. They climb mountains in Switzerland when they ought to be loitering on the sea shore or lounging the deck of an ocean steamer. They rise early "to make the best of to-day" when they had better lie several hours longer to fix the benefits of yesterday. Like the unskilled rider, who dismounts for relief, they are frequently driven to bed to recover from their holiday exertions.

The amount of exercise must be regulated by its effects on head or spine. Mere muscular fatigue may be overcome by regular walking, but nervous fatigue must be entirely avoided. If the patient can not take sufficient exercise to sustain his appetite and digestion he had better undergo an hour's massage daily. And when he has once gained the power of walking from five to ten miles a day without fatigue to head or spine, he ought, by constant practice, endeavor to retain it.

There is no better preventive of nervous exhaustion than regular unhurried muscular exercise. If we could moderate our hurry, lessen our worry, and increase our open-air exercise, a large portion of nervous diseases would be abolished.

For those who can not get a sufficient holiday the best substitute is an occasional day in bed. Many whose nerves are constantly strained in their daily vocation have discovered this for themselves. A Spanish merchant in Barcelona told his medical man that he always went to bed for two or three days whenever he could be spared from his business, and he laughed at those who spent their holidays on toilsome mountains. One of the hardest-worked women in England, who has for many years conducted a large wholesale business, retains excellent nerves at an advanced age, owing, it is believed, to her habit of taking one day a week in bed. If we can not avoid frequent agitation we ought, if possible, to give the nervous system time to recover itself between the shocks.

Even an hour's seclusion after a good lunch will deprive a hurried, anxious day of much of its injury. The nerves can often be overcome by strategem when they refuse to be controlled by strength of will.—Nineteenth Century.

Manhood in Criminals.

Speaking of his experience with criminals, Judge Gresham says: My experience with criminals, when I was on a district bench, taught me that there was no man devoid of manhood. Place anybody, however depraved, on his manhood, and you will observe his eye brighten up. I have taken men who have been convicted of serious offenses, and after sentencing them to the penitentiary, have said: "Now, I intend to place you on your manhood, for I believe you have manhood in you. I will give you a mittimus, and the marshal will provide you with money to go home and bid your family good-bye. After you have stayed there a day or two I want you to report at the door of the penitentiary named in the papers you will receive, and serve out your sentence like a man. And when you are through I want you to return to me, and I want to see what can be done to restore you to the confidence of your fellow-men in society." I never was disappointed in a man I thus trusted, and those convicts whom I have helped on their return from prison have always been faithful to the trusts imposed upon them.—Chicago Journal.

INVALIDS' HOTEL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE

No. 663 Main Street, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Not a Hospital, but a pleasant Remedial Home, organized with

A FULL STAFF OF EIGHTEEN PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS,

And exclusively devoted to the treatment of all Chronic Diseases.

This imposing Establishment was designed and erected to accommodate the large number of invalids who visit Buffalo from every State and Territory, as well as from many foreign lands, that they may avail themselves of the professional services of the Staff of skilled specialists in medicine and surgery that compose the Faculty of this widely-celebrated institution.

A FAIR AND BUSINESS-LIKE OFFER TO INVALIDS.

We earnestly invite you to come, see and examine for yourself, our institutions, appliances, advantages and success in curing chronic diseases. Have a mind of your own. Do not listen to or heed the counsel of skeptical friends or jealous physicians, who know nothing of us, our system of treatment, or means of cure, yet who never lose an opportunity to misrepresent and endeavor to prejudice people against us. We are responsible to you for what we represent, and if you come and visit us, and find that we have misrepresented, in any particular, our institutions, advantages or success, we will promptly refund to you all expenses of your trip. We court honest, sincere investigation, have no secrets, and are only too glad to show all interested and candid people what we are doing for suffering humanity.

NOT ALWAYS NECESSARY TO SEE PATIENTS.

By our original system of diagnosis, we can treat many chronic diseases just as successfully without as with a personal consultation. While we are always glad to see our patients, and become acquainted with them, show them our institutions, and familiarize them with our system of treatment, yet we have not seen one person in five hundred whom we have cured. The perfect accuracy with which scientists are enabled to deduce the most minute particulars in their several departments, appears almost miraculous, if we view it in the light of the early ages. Take, for example, the electro-magnetic telegraph, the greatest invention of the age. Is it not a marvelous degree of accuracy which enables an operator to exactly locate a fracture in a submarine cable nearly three thousand miles long? Our venerable "clerk of the weather" has become so thoroughly familiar with the most wayward elements of nature that he can accurately predict their movements. He can sit in Washington and foretell what the weather will be in Florida or New York as well as if several hundred miles did not intervene between him and the places named. And so in all departments of modern science, what is required is the knowledge of certain signs. From these scientists deduce accurate conclusions regardless of distance. So, also, in medical science, diseases have certain unmistakable signs, or symptoms, and by reason of this fact, we have been enabled to originate and perfect a system of determining, with the greatest accuracy, the nature of chronic diseases, without seeing and personally examining our patients. In recognizing diseases without a personal examination of the patient, we claim to possess no miraculous powers. We obtain our knowledge of the patient's disease by the practical application, to the practice of medicine, of well-established principles of modern science. And it is to the accuracy with which this system has endowed us that we owe our almost world-wide reputation of skillfully treating lingering or chronic affections. This system of practice, and the marvelous success which has been attained through it, demonstrate the fact that diseases display certain phenomena, which, being subjected to scientific analysis, furnish abundant and unmistakable data, to guide the judgment of the skillful practitioner aright in determining the nature of diseased conditions. The most ample resources for treating lingering or chronic diseases, and the greatest skill, are thus placed within the easy reach of every invalid, however distant he or she may reside from the physicians making the treatment of such affections a specialty. Full particulars of our original, scientific system of examining and treating patients at a distance are contained in "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser." By R. V. Pierce, M. D. 1000 pages and over 300 colored and other illustrations. Sent, post-paid, for $1.50. Or write and describe your symptoms, inclosing ten cents in stamps, and a complete treatise, on your particular disease, will be sent you, with our terms for treatment and all particulars.

MARVELOUS SUCCESS.

SIGNS OF DISEASE.

COMMON SENSE AS APPLIED TO MEDICINE.

It is a well-known fact, and one that appeals to the judgment of every thinking person, that the physician who devotes his whole time to the study and investigation of a certain class of diseases, must become better qualified to treat such diseases than he who attempts to treat every ill to which flesh is heir, without giving special attention to any class of diseases. Men, in all ages of the world, who have become famous, have devoted their lives to some special branch of science, art, or literature.

By thorough organization, and subdividing the practice of medicine and surgery in this institution, every invalid is treated by a specialist—one who devotes his undivided attention to the particular class of diseases to which the case belongs. The advantage of this arrangement must be obvious. Medical science offers a vast field for investigation, and no physician can, within the brief limits of a life-time, achieve the highest degree of success in the treatment of every malady incident to humanity.

OUR FIELD OF SUCCESS.

NASAL, THROAT AND LUNG DISEASES. The treatment of Diseases of the Air Passages and Lungs, such as Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, both through correspondence and at our institutions, constitutes an important specialty.

We publish three separate books on Nasal, Throat and Lung Diseases, which give much valuable information, viz: (1) A Treatise on Consumption, Laryngitis and Bronchitis; price, post-paid, ten cents. (2) A Treatise on Asthma, or Phthisis, giving new and successful treatment; price, post-paid, ten cents. (3) A Treatise on Chronic Nasal Catarrh; price, post-paid, two cents.

DISEASES OF DIGESTION. Dyspepsia, "Liver Complaint," Obstinate Constipation, Chronic Diarrhea, Tape-worms, and kindred affections are among those chronic diseases in the successful treatment of which our specialists have attained great success. Many of the diseases affecting the liver and other organs contributing in their functions to the process of digestion, are very obscure, and are not infrequently mistaken by both laymen and physicians for other maladies, and treatment is employed directed to the removal of a disease which does not exist. Our Complete Treatise on Diseases of the Digestive Organs will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

KIDNEY DISEASES. BRIGHT'S DISEASE, DIABETES, and kindred maladies, have been very largely treated, and cures effected in thousands of cases which had been pronounced beyond hope. These diseases are readily diagnosticated, or determined, by chemical analysis of the urine, without a personal examination of patients, who can, therefore, generally be successfully treated at their homes. The study and practice of chemical analysis and microscopical examination of the urine in our consideration of cases, with reference to correct diagnosis, in which our institution long ago became famous, has naturally led to a very extensive practice in diseases of the urinary organs. Probably no other institution in the world has been so largely patronized by sufferers from this class of maladies as the old and world-famed World's Dispensary and Invalids' Hotel. Our specialists have acquired, through a vast and varied experience, great expertness in determining the exact nature of each case, and, hence, have been successful in nicely adapting their remedies for the cure of each individual case.

CAUTION. These delicate diseases should be carefully treated by a specialist thoroughly familiar with them, and who is competent to ascertain the exact condition and stage of advancement which the disease has reached (which can only be ascertained by a careful chemical and microscopical examination of the urine), for medicines which are curative in one stage or condition are known to do positive injury in others. We have never, therefore, attempted to put up anything for general sale through druggists, recommending to cure these diseases, although possessing very superior remedies, knowing full well from an extensive experience that the only safe and successful course is to carefully determine the disease and its progress in each case by a chemical and microscopical examination of the urine, and then adapt our medicines to the exact stage of the disease and condition of our patient.

WONDERFUL SUCCESS. To this wise course of action we attribute the marvelous success attained by our specialists in that important and extensive Department of our institutions devoted exclusively to the treatment of diseases of the kidneys and bladder. The treatment of diseases of the urinary organs having constituted a leading branch of our practice at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, and, being in constant receipt of numerous inquiries for a complete work on the nature and curability of these maladies, written in a style to be easily understood, we have published a large Illustrated Treatise on these diseases, which will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

BLADDER DISEASES. INFLAMMATION OF THE BLADDER, STONE IN THE BLADDER, Gravel, Enlarged Prostate Gland, Retention of Urine, and kindred affections, may be included among those in the cure of which our specialists have achieved extraordinary success. These are fully treated of in our illustrated pamphlet on Urinary Diseases. Sent by mail for ten cents in stamps.

STRICTURE. STRICTURES AND URINARY FISTULÆ.—Hundreds of cases of the worst form of strictures, many of them greatly aggravated by the careless use of instruments in the hands of inexperienced physicians and surgeons, causing false passages, urinary fistulæ, and other complications, annually consult us for relief and cure. That no case of this class is too difficult for the skill of our specialists is proved by cures reported in our illustrated treatise on these maladies, to which we refer with pride. To intrust this class of cases to physicians of small experience is a dangerous proceeding. Many a man has been ruined for life by so doing, while thousands annually lose their lives through unskillful treatment. Send particulars of your case and ten cents in stamps for a large, illustrated treatise containing many testimonials.

NERVOUS DISEASES. Epileptic Convulsions, or Fits, Paralysis, or Palsy, Locomotor Ataxia, St. Vitus's Dance, Insomnia, or inability to sleep, and threatened insanity, Nervous Debility, arising from overstudy, excesses, and other causes, and every variety of nervous affection, are treated by our specialists for these diseases with unusual success. See numerous cases reported in our different illustrated pamphlets on nervous diseases, any one of which will be sent for ten cents in postage stamps, when request for them is accompanied with a statement of a case for consultation, so that we may know which one of our Treatises to send.

DISEASES OF WOMEN. We have a special Department, thoroughly organized, and devoted exclusively to the treatment of Diseases of Women. Every case consulting our specialists, whether by letter or in person, is given the most careful and considerate attention. Important cases (and we get few which have not already baffled the skill of all the home physicians) has the benefit of a full Council, of skilled specialists. Rooms for ladies in the Invalids' Hotel are very private. Send ten cents in stamps for our large Complete Treatise on Diseases of Women, illustrated with numerous wood-cuts and colored plates (130 pages).

RADICAL CURE OF RUPTURE. HERNIA (Breach), or RUPTURE, no matter of how long standing, or of what size, is promptly and permanently cured by our specialists, without the knife and without dependence upon trusses. Absolute references. Send ten cents for Illustrated Treatise.

PILES, FISTULÆ, and other diseases affecting the lower bowels, are treated with wonderful success. The worst cases of pile tumors are permanently cured in fifteen to twenty days. Send ten cents for Illustrated Treatise.

DELICATE DISEASES. Organic weakness, nervous debility, premature decline of the manly powers, involuntary vital losses, impaired memory, mental anxiety, absence of will-power, melancholy, weak back, and kindred affections, are speedily, thoroughly and permanently cured.

To those acquainted with our institutions, it is hardly necessary to say that the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, with the branch establishment located at No. 3 New Oxford Street, London, England, have, for many years, enjoyed the distinction of being the most largely patronized and widely celebrated institutions in the world for the treatment and cure of those affections which arise from youthful indiscretions and pernicious, solitary practices.

We, many years ago, established a special Department for the treatment of these diseases, under the management of some of the most skillful physicians and surgeons on our Staff, in order that all who apply to us might receive all the advantages of a full Council of the most experienced specialists.

WE OFFER NO APOLOGY. We offer no apology for devoting so much attention to this neglected class of diseases, believing no condition of humanity is too wretched to merit the sympathy and best services of the noble profession to which we belong. Many who suffer from these terrible diseases contract them innocently. Why any medical man, intent on doing good and alleviating suffering, should shun such cases, we cannot imagine. Why any one should consider it otherwise than most honorable to cure the worst cases of these diseases, we cannot understand; and yet of all the other maladies which afflict mankind there is probably none about which physicians in general practice know so little. We shall, therefore, continue, as heretofore, to treat with our best consideration, sympathy, and skill, all applicants who are suffering from any of these delicate diseases.

CURED AT HOME. Most of these cases can be treated when at a distance just as well as if here in person.

A Complete Treatise (136 pages) on these diseases sent sealed, in plain envelope, secure from observation, on receipt of only ten cents, in stamps, for postage.

SURGICAL PRACTICE. Hundreds of the most difficult operations known to modern surgery are annually performed in the most skillful manner, by our Surgeon-specialists. Large Stones are safely removed from the Bladder, by crushing, washing and pumping them out, thus avoiding the great danger of cutting. Our specialists, remove cataract from the eye, thereby curing blindness. They also straighten cross-eyes and insert artificial ones when needed. Many Ovarian and also Fibroid Tumors of the Uterus are arrested in growth and cured by electrolysis, coupled with other means of our invention, whereby the great danger of cutting operations in these cases is avoided.

Especially has the success of our improved operations for Varicocele, Hydrocele, Fistulæ, Ruptured Cervix Uteri, and for Ruptured Perineum, been alike gratifying both to ourselves and our patients. Not less so have been the results of numerous operations for Stricture of the Cervical Canal, a condition in the female generally resulting in Barrenness, or Sterility, and the cure of which, by a safe and painless operation, removes this commonest of impediments to the bearing of offspring.

A Complete Treatise on any one of the above maladies will be sent on receipt of ten cents in stamps.

ALL CHRONIC DISEASES A SPECIALTY. Although we have in the preceding paragraphs, made mention of some of the special ailments to which particular attention is given by the specialists at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, yet the institution abounds in skill, facilities, and apparatus for the successful treatment of every form of chronic ailment, whether requiring for its cure medical or surgical means.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1888.

Last week the Baltimore papers spoke of a controversy in the House of Delegates between Messrs. Friend and Wilson on the passage of Mr. Friend's bill to compel the County Commissioners of this county to levy a large sum of money on the road leading from Friendsville via Selbysport to the Pennsylvania line.

Mr. Wilson opposed the bill and succeeded in preventing its passage two weeks ago, but Mr. Friend waited until there was a comparatively full house and then it was passed by a party vote.

Following is the substance of Mr. Wilson's remarks, omitting interruptions and some minor matters:

Mr. Speaker: I am still opposed to the passage of this bill, and more decidedly so since I have learned something more of its character. My colleague has been trying to convince himself, and the members of this House, that there is a thing in Garrett county called the Legislative Road. Now I don't know how near he came to deceiving himself into that belief, but every other member who has looked into the matter and knows anything about it, knows that there is no such road in the county as a Legislative Road. But my colleague indulged in some remarks the other night which I must refer to. He said in the first place, that I lived out in West Virginia and was not supposed to know very much about Garrett county affairs. Now I am sure he does not believe this himself, and when I state to the House that I have lived in Garrett county all my life, that all my property was in Garrett county, and that I pay taxes in Garrett county, I thought this accusation was sufficiently refuted. But he said further that I had never been down in that part of the county which is to be benefited by the Legislative Road. Perhaps when he said this he thought he was telling the truth, but he didn't know whether he was or not. He was not, however, as I have been there and know more about it than he cares to acknowledge.

The fact of the business is, he owns some tracts of land down along where his road is to be located, and has a large personal interest in it. He seeks to take advantage of the accident of his election as a member of the Legislature to compel the County Commissioners to open a road that he has a large personal interest in, and I am opposed to it because it is the subversion of a public trust to personal ends.

The gentleman says that if I want a road in my neighborhood why don't I get up a bill. Well I must remind him that I am not that sort of a man. I was sent here by my people to look after their interests, and not to make raids on the county treasury for my own personal benefit.

The facts with reference to the Legislative Road are about these: Twenty years ago there was an act passed authorizing the County Commissioners of Allegany county to levy $4,000 for a road from Oakland to the National Road, and I remember what was said about it. There was a job in it for certain parties, as there always is under such circumstances; and $1500 or $2000 laid out by the County Commissioners in the usual way would have accomplished as much as the four thousand dollars did accomplish, and with two years of this kind of experience the people found out better and repealed the law in 1870, and there is now no legislative road in Garrett county.

I am also opposed to it because it involves the question of local self government. The Legislature has no right to usurp the function of the County Commissions, who are the proper parties to apply to. A bill has been introduced to take away from the County Commissioners of Garrett county the appointment of tax-collector, and another the appointment of judges of elections, and if we are going to invade every prerogative of the County Commissioners we had better pass an act abolishing the board of Commissioners altogether.

I oppose it, Mr. Speaker, because it is a dangerous precedent. Pass this bill and every member who comes here from Garrett county hereafter will have a law passed to compell the County Commissioners to build a legislative road through his immediate neighborhood.

But I am also opposed to it for another reason, and that is, I know the county treasury is not in a condition to bear it. I have been before the Commissioners from time to time asking for a little help in roads in my neighborhood, and I know how embarrassed and perplexed they are with their scanty means to know how to make the ends meet.

Taxation in Garrett county now almost amounts to confiscation. Four year ago the rate went up to $1.58½ on the hundred, and there has been but a slight reduction since, and yet, with all this excessive burden of taxation, we have had but nine months school in three years. Our children are growing up in ignorance, and I can assure the members of this House that there are other interests demanding the expenditure of the taxpayers' money with a great deal more urgency than the so-called Legislative Road.

Annapolis Letter.

ANNAPOLIS, MD., March 10, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—I gave you last week a synopsis of the reform league election law. Since then the mill has been kept grinding, and during the week two additional bills have been formulated, one of which has been printed, and the other has been under discussion in the Senate. The one I have examined is a much worse bill than any of its predecessors, as it authorizes the Governor to appoint three Registration officers for each election district. This would make the election expenses nearly three times as much as they are under the old law, but has the advantage of being precisely in line with the central idea in all Democratic legislation. With the average Democrat, as the party is now composed, Legislation is simply a means to an end, and the end is spelled with six-letters—boodle. And this of course means a heavy burden on the taxpayers, with hard work and scant comforts for the masses.

The bill authorizing the appointment of the School Commissioners for Garrett county by the Governor, is a fair example of the direction of the political current at Annapolis. The same law which governs the school system of the other counties does not apply to Garrett county hereafter, although the constitution and the law says the system shall be uniform. Hereafter we are not to have the same rights and privileges which the other counties enjoy. I have foreseen that the nesessity would arise to give the Governor the appointing power, in order to save to the Democracy the little pitiful bit of patronage there is in it, but it had never occurred to me that Garrett county was to be singled out and this humiliating stigma placed on her alone.

It is indeed a sad commentary on our county, where the people should be as free as the winds that sweep over their mountain homes, that she must be singled out from among the other counties, and the vital question of the education of the children turned over to the tender care of the political crows and buzzards which infest her borders. It is a burning, blistering, withering shame that the rights of a people, no longer free, should be so trampled on; and the meagre educational facilities they have made a bone of contention by a set of place-hunters, too proud or too lazy to earn an honest living by honest work.

Our masters here excuse themselves by saying that the judges would not appoint, but everybody knows that that is not the trouble, and further everybody knows just what it is, and all the whys and wherefores.

Allegany and Washington counties get along without trouble, and the same Judges appoint their School Commissioners. The trouble is, the judges refuse to appoint a new board at the dictation of the Oakland ring.

Browning, it is said, wants Dr. Bartlett's place for his brother, and the school system must be changed to accommodate him. However this may be, it is an outrageous proceeding. The county is reduced to a pitiable plight. It was bad enough in all conscience before, but what may be expected after such a proceeding as this, when to accommodate a certain clique or faction of hungry spoils hunters, Garrett county must be collared and dragged out from under the provisions of the general law.

Who among her citizens does not realize the shame and the humiliation of it; and who so tame and spiritless as not to resent it?

The school commissioners ought to be elected. The people to whom they should be responsible should make the appointment. But if not by the voters themselves, they should be appointed by the board of officers standing nearest the people, which would be the County Commissioners or Judges of the Orphans' Court.

Next after the county officials in their representative capacity comes the Judges of the Circuit Court. They come directly in contact with the people, know them, and have no motive for appointing any but honest capable men.

The Governor is the worst possible custodian of the appointing power, for he cannot know the people, and must depend on the recommendations of his party, as of course he will hear no other. This virtually places the appointing power in the hands of the local rings.

So far as I am aware there has never been the breath of a suspicion against the present board of School Commissioners. The only reasonable complaint has been that Dr. Bartlett's salary was too large, and that the salary should not have gone on when the schools were stopped.

But who expects any thing better now when the appointing power is removed as far as possible away from the people, and made the property of the boodle gang.

It is a fact that we are being stripped of our vested rights. One by one our privileges as freemen are being stricken down. There is scarcely a measure proposed in the Legislature that does not turn out to be an effort to cover up and legalize some sort of scheme for plunder; and the discouraging feature of it is, no measure is too outrageously vicious to be passed by a party vote.

Yours truly,
W.

The Parkersburg Sentinel has a leading editorial in favor of the nomination of the Hon. Henry G. Davis as the Democratic candidate for governor of West Virginia. It pays an earnest tribute to Mr. Davis's ability his experience in public affairs and his success as an organizer. It further deciares that "no man is doing more to attract the capitalists of the world to West Virginia, and no one is doing as much to open up the hidden wealth of our mountains and bring in wealth to the people."

The rifle-shooting tournament to come off at Neward, N. J., in June, premises to eclipse that of Geneva, Switzerland, last year. It is to be held under the auspices of the Newark Rifle Club, and will last from the 9th to the 14th of June. The club named will give $20,000, and every club that enters is expected to subscribe to the fund, which will be devoted to prizes. This plan, it is expected, will raise a total of about $100,000. Invitations have not only been sent to every rifle club in America, but also to all the prominet clubs in Europe.

An example of deterioration in values is shown in the sale of the Great Eastern for less than $100,000. The original cost of the vessel was three and a half million dollars, but she was a gigantic failure from the start, The building of the ship, however, was of value in demonstrating that there was a limit in steamships in the direction of size. A good-looking, well-dressed stranger one day last week in Baltimore stole and sold a saw-mill, pocketed $700 in cash and skipped the country. He contracted with Mr. Henry Wagner, 229 S. Exeter street, to do the hauling, who had to hire a number of additional men at $2.50 per day, and after the job was done invited Mr. Wagner in to a sumptuous dinner, and requested him to make out his bill for the work. While Mr. Wagner was doing this the smooth-tongued and apparently clever stranger, excused himself, saying he would be back in a moment, and that was the last seen of him. Quite a number of persons, including a number of police were present, but no one suspected that the stranger was a rogue of the sleekest kind. It is said Judge Steward laughed quite heartily when he heard of it, and said that a man who could work through a scheme of that kind deserved to get off.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, March 12th, 1888.—"Who will get Blaine's strength?" is the substance of the question that Republicans are asking each other every day. Who will get it is problematical at this time, but the fact that no one has got it so far, is very patent. The Blaine supporters have not stampeded. They say they have no second choice, but will support any good Republican who may receive the nominatinn. As long as things remain as they have been since Blaine's letter was published, it would be perfectly absurd to attempt to say who will be nominated by the Chicago convention.

Unless the republican sentiment of the country shall concentrate upon some one man to a much greater extent than it now shows any indication of doing, it is thought extremely probable that Mr. Blaine will be nominated by acclamation, and compelled by the unanimous sentiment of the party to accept. The convention is drawing very near, three months is a very short time in which to work up a boom, and no one of the gentlemen who has been mentioned for the nomination has any organized following, with the the possible exception of Senator Sherman, Of course the fact must be taken into consideration that Mr. Sherman is the only avowed candidate up to this time.

There is a rumor here that Clevelann has written a letter stating that he will not allow his name to go before the nominating convention and further that under no circumstances will he accept the nomination. This letter is said to be in the hands of ex-mayor Edward Cooper of New Yory city, who is authorized to make it public at any time he may see fit to do so. Such a letter may be in the hands of Mr. Cooper, but it will be safe to wager something handsome that it will never be made public unless Cleveland becomes convinced that Hill will defeat him for the nomination. In other words Cleveland wants the nomination if he can get it, but if he sees there is no chance for him, he will decline it.

Mr. Randall's own special little tariff bill is complete, though it has not yet been introduced in the House. It will reduce the internal revenue about $60,000,000 per annum and customs about $25,000,000. Many well informed people here think it very likely that the Republicans will support Randall's bill.

Senator Ingalls was voted a gold headed cane at the G. A. R. fair in this city as the most popular Presiuential candidate.

The Senate having passed the Dependent Pension bill it has now gone to the House, where it will be sure to pass, unless the Cleveland Democrats succeed in their scheme to prevent its being voted upon.

The bill which recently passed the House, depriving all books, except magazines, of the benefit of second-class (one cent a pound) postage, has met with so much opposition in the Senate Committee on Postoffices that it will not in all probability ever be reported to the Senate. The Committee decided that the benefit it derived by the people in cheapening the price of good books, far exceeded the injury done by the sending of trashy literature at a low rate of postage.

At last Congress seems to have become aware of the fact that our harbors and sea coasts are in need of defenses. The House military committee have unanimously agreed to report favorably the Cutcheon bill appropriating $7,475,00 to build a gun factory and purchase material for the manufacture of heavy ordnance. The Senate Committee on coast defenses have also agreed to make a favorable report on Senator Dolph's bill appropriating $126,378,800 for the purpose of building fortifications at all the ports of the United States.

The most pronounced political speech of the session was made by Senator Ingalls on the Dependent Pension bill. He scored the Administration and the ex-rebels who opposed the bill in a merciless manner. The speech was repeatedly applauded by the crowded galleries.

A delegation of Tammany Hall Democrats visited this city a few days ago and demanded of Cleveland the removal of Pearson, the Mugwump postmaster of New York city, and the appointment of a Tammany man in his piace. It is said that Cleveland promised to accede to the demand and that Pearson will have to go. It is also said that the Tammany men are to desert Hill and support Cleveland as the result of this bargain.

Quite a number of publications turned out by the Government Printing Office since Benedict took charge have had to be reprinted at the expense of the Government. They contained so many errors as to be worthless. The last case of this sort was reported to the Senate by Secretary Endicott last week. This is the direct result of Benedict's narrow ideas of economy.

There was a marble bust of the late Senator John A. Logan on exhibition in what is known as the marble room of the Senate. It is a striking resemblance and attracts much attention. It was made for Mrs. Lofian and will shortly be removed to her residence.

A Fearful Storm.

NEW YORK, March 12.—The hardest snow storm of the year by far is raging in New York City. It began early this morning and at 8 o'clock was a foot or over on the ground. A high wind caused drifts which, in the upper part of the city, were three and four feet high. Traffic was almost suspended. Thousands of passengers were blocked on the elevated roads. The people who left uptown by the elevated roads were unable to get further than Eighth street by the road. Many of the more venturesome descended to the street by ladder and walked the rest of the way down town. People in suburban towns found it almost impossible to reach the city.

An Albany dispatch says: The snow storm in this vicinity is the severest of the season, Horse cars are blocked and trains are hours behind. If the storm continues, of which there is every prospect, there will be a general train blockade before night.

A dispatch from Troy says: About fifteen inches of snow has fallen here and still falling; seventeen inches reported at Saratoga. Railroad men believe that they have not seen the worst of the storm, however, and predict a very serious time if the wind increases.

Business is virtually at a standstill. Down-town houses are almost deserted. Only two trains arrived with the mails this morning and work at the postoffice was paralyzed. The carriers made two trips, but in many cases had to bring the mail back, owing to business offices being closed. Postmaster Harrison said he had not seen such a blockade for a number of years. All the telegraph and telephone wires in the city are in bad working order. Hundreds of wires are down, having been broken by the mass of ice and snow. The ferry-boats between New York and Brooklyn and New Jersey are running once in an hour or less.

The storm is increasing and is unprecedented. All business has been paralyzed at Stock Exchange,

The weather has stopped the courts, jurors and witnesses in a murder case being unable to arrive.

Every street car in New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City and the elevated trains are stopped. The Brooklyn bridge and ferries have been almost abandoned. Down-town hotels are crammed with suburbanites. The The elevated roads run three thousand trains daily usually, and have never been obliged to stop. Of forty mails due between four o'clock and noon only two arrived by two in the afternoon.

A Canajahorie dispatch says: Snow has fallen in the Mohawk Valley for twenty-four hours and high winds have banked it in the highways, Railroad trains are greatly delayed,

MIDNIGHT—Storm unabated and as furious as ever, but the snow has stopped falling. Snow drifts in the business streets are as deep as in the country districts. Grown persons here never saw the like. But meagre reports are received from uptown districts, but in the lower precincts where reporters managed to struggle through the snow against the wind, more than one hundred fractures of the limbs and concussions of the skull were reported. The ambulance horses and different hospitals were completely fagged early in the night and calls in many cases could not be responded to.

Mills and His Tariff-Smasher.

That it was carefully drawn for the purpose of holding the Southern vote, which the Democrats see is wavering, is very apparent.—Lynn Item.

The fact is the bill is dangerous. It threatens every industry it touches, and it is to be doubted whether it would reduce the revenue a dollar.—Haverhill Gazette.

What the Mills bill may bring forth in the way of relief if it becomes a law no man can say with reasonable certainty, and for this reason it should not become a law.—Boston Advertiser.

It will be remarkable, indeed, if the bill, affecting as it does so many important interests, commands the unanimous and unfaltering support of the Democrats as it now stands.—Cincinnati Inquirer.

It bears evidence on its face that it is the outcome of a compromise between contending interests to such an extent that nobody is likely to be altogether satisfied with its provisions.—Newport News.

Wool is put on the free list, while the duty on woolens is cut in more than one place, and in such a way that the woolen manufacturers whom the committee predicted would be so joyful will not be slow in making a loud protest.—Nashua Telegraph.

The ruling principle which has governed the preparation of the bill appears to have been a desire to placate the protectionists Democrats in the South and the Democratic party in places where it feels the need of special help for the coming campaign.—Springfield Union.

This bill is a campaign documont pure and simple. It is daubed with the honey of free tradism just sufficiently to catch that element, is crystallized with the sugar of the raw material idea, and just fringed with a little protection to make the dish presentable.—Harrisburg Call.

It is a deliberate blow at the industries of the United States—a deliberate attempt to break them down in the interest of Foreign trade. The adoption of this measure would increase—largely increase—the income of the government instead of reducing it.—Washington Republican.

The bill is constructed upon free trade principles, and goes as far in the direction of free trade as was expected. It proposes absolute free trade in some of the products of this country that give employment to hundreds of thousands of men, and strikes the severest blow possible at many of our most important industries.—Cleveland News and Herald.

The Mills tariff bill can be summarized as follows: Everything the South wants free is free. The reduction of the revenue is brought about by slashing into the Northern States regardless of consequences. But then, what would you expect of a Southern free trade caucus?—Boston Record.

The German Emperor died on Friday of last week.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1888.

Last week the Baltimore papers spoke of a controversy in the House of Delegates between Messrs. Friend and Wilson on the passage of Mr. Friend's bill to compel the County Commissioners of this county to levy a large sum of money on the road leading from Friendsville via Selbysport to the Pennsylvania line.

Mr. Wilson opposed the bill and succeeded in preventing its passage two weeks ago, but Mr. Friend waited until there was a comparatively full house and then it was passed by a party vote.

Following is the substance of Mr. Wilson's remarks, omitting interruptions and some minor matters:

Mr. Speaker: I am still opposed to the passage of this bill, and more decidedly so since I have learned something more of its character. My colleague has been trying to convince himself, and the members of this House, that there is a thing in Garrett county called the Legislative Road. Now I don't know how near he came to deceiving himself into that belief, but every other member who has looked into the matter and knows anything about it, knows that there is no such road in the county as a Legislative Road. But my colleague indulged in some remarks the other night which I must refer to. He said in the first place, that I lived out in West Virginia and was not supposed to know very much about Garrett county affairs. Now I am sure he does not believe this himself, and when I state to the House that I have lived in Garrett county all my life, that all my property was in Garrett county, and that I pay taxes in Garrett county, I thought this accusation was sufficiently refuted. But he said further that I had never been down in that part of the county which is to be benefited by the Legislative Road. Perhaps when he said this he thought he was telling the truth, but he didn't know whether he was or not. He was not, however, as I have been there and know more about it than he cares to acknowledge.

The fact of the business is, he owns some tracts of land down along where his road is to be located, and has a large personal interest in it. He seeks to take advantage of the accident of his election as a member of the Legislature to compel the County Commissioners to open a road that he has a large personal interest in, and I am opposed to it because it is the subversion of a public trust to personal ends.

The gentleman says that if I want a road in my neighborhood why don't I get up a bill. Well I must remind him that I am not that sort of a man. I was sent here by my people to look after their interests, and not to make raids on the county treasury for my own personal benefit.

The facts with reference to the Legislative Road are about these: Twenty years ago there was an act passed authorizing the County Commissioners of Allegany county to levy $4,000 for a road from Oakland to the National Road, and I remember what was said about it. There was a job in it for certain parties, as there always is under such circumstances; and $1500 or $2000 laid out by the County Commissioners in the usual way would have accomplished as much as the four thousand dollars did accomplish, and with two years of this kind of experience the people found out better and repealed the law in 1870, and there is now no legislative road in Garrett county.

I am also opposed to it because it involves the question of local self government. The Legislature has no right to usurp the function of the County Commissions, who are the proper parties to apply to. A bill has been introduced to take away from the County Commissioners of Garrett county the appointment of tax-collector, and another the appointment of judges of elections, and if we are going to invade every prerogative of the County Commissioners we had better pass an act abolishing the board of Commissioners altogether.

I oppose it, Mr. Speaker, because it is a dangerous precedent. Pass this bill and every member who comes here from Garrett county hereafter will have a law passed to compel the County Commissioners to build a legislative road through his immediate neighborhood.

But I am also opposed to it for another reason, and that is, I know the county treasury is not in a condition to bear it. I have been before the Commissioners from time to time asking for a little help in roads in my neighborhood, and I know how embarrassed and perplexed they are with their scanty means to know how to make the ends meet.

Taxation in Garrett county now almost amounts to confiscation. Four year ago the rate went up to $1.58½ on the hundred, and there has been but a slight reduction since, and yet, with all this excessive burden of taxation, we have had but nine months school in three years. Our children are growing up in ignorance, and I can assure the members of this House that there are other interests demanding the expenditure of the taxpayers' money with a great deal more urgency than the so-called Legislative Road.

Annapolis Letter.

ANNAPOLIS, MD., March 10, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—I gave you last week a synopsis of the reform league election law. Since then the mill has been kept grinding, and during the week two additional bills have been formulated, one of which has been printed, and the other has been under discussion in the Senate. The one I have examined is a much worse bill than any of its predecessors, as it authorizes the Governor to appoint three Registration officers for each election district. This would make the election expenses nearly three times as much as they are under the old law, but has the advantage of being precisely in line with the central idea in all Democratic legislation. With the average Democrat, as the party is now composed, Legislation is simply a means to an end, and the end is spelled with six-letters—boodle. And this of course means a heavy burden on the taxpayers, with hard work and scant comforts for the masses.

The bill authorizing the appointment of the School Commissioners for Garrett county by the Governor, is a fair example of the direction of the political current at Annapolis. The same law which governs the school system of the other counties does not apply to Garrett county hereafter, although the constitution and the law says the system shall be uniform. Hereafter we are not to have the same rights and privileges which the other counties enjoy. I have foreseen that the nesessity would arise to give the Governor the appointing power, in order to save to the Democracy the little pitiful bit of patronage there is in it, but it had never occurred to me that Garrett county was to be singled out and this humiliating stigma placed on her alone.

It is indeed a sad commentary on our county, where the people should be as free as the winds that sweep over their mountain homes, that she must be singled out from among the other counties, and the vital question of the education of the children turned over to the tender care of the political crows and buzzards which infest her borders. It is a burning, blistering, withering shame that the rights of a people, no longer free, should be so trampled on; and the meagre educational facilities they have made a bone of contention by a set of place-hunters, too proud or too lazy to earn an honest living by honest work.

Our masters here excuse themselves by saying that the judges would not appoint, but everybody knows that that is not the trouble, and further everybody knows just what it is, and all the whys and wherefores.

Allegany and Washington counties get along without trouble, and the same Judges appoint their School Commissioners. The trouble is, the judges refuse to appoint a new board at the dictation of the Oakland ring.

Browning, it is said, wants Dr. Bartlett's place for his brother, and the school system must be changed to accommodate him. However this may be, it is an outrageous proceeding. The county is reduced to a pitiable plight. It was bad enough in all conscience before, but what may be expected after such a proceeding as this, when to accommodate a certain clique or faction of hungry spoils hunters, Garrett county must be collared and dragged out from under the provisions of the general law.

Senator Ingalls was voted a gold headed cane at the G. A. R. fair in this city as the most popular Presiuential candidate.

The Senate having passed the Dependent Pension bill it has now gone to the House, where it will be sure to pass, unless the Cleveland Democrats succeed in their scheme to prevent its being voted upon.

The bill which recently passed the House, depriving all books, except magazines, of the benefit of second-class (one cent a pound) postage, has met with so much opposition in the Senate Committee on Postoffices that it will not in all probability ever be reported to the Senate. The Committee decided that the benefit it derived by the people in cheapening the price of good books, far exceeded the injury done by the sending of trashy literature at a low rate of postage.

At last Congress seems to have become aware of the fact that our harbors and sea coasts are in need of defenses. The House military committee have unanimously agreed to report favorably the Cutcheon bill appropriating $7,475,00 to build a gun factory and purchase material for the manufacture of heavy ordnance. The Senate Committee on coast defenses have also agreed to make a favorable report on Senator Dolph's bill appropriating $126,378,800 for the purpose of bulding fortifications at all the ports of the United States.

The most pronounced political speech of the session was made by Senator Ingalls on the Dependent Pension bill. He scored the Administration and the ex-rebels who opposed the bill in a merciless manner. The speech was repeatedly applauded by the crowded galleries.

A delegation of Tammany Hall Democrats visited this city a few days ago and demanded of Cleveland the removal of Pearson, the Mugwump postmaster of New York city, and the appointment of a Tammany man in his place. It is said that Cleveland promised to accede to the demand and that Pearson will have to go. It is also said that the Tammany men are to desert Hill and support Cleveland as the result of this bargain.

Quite a number of publications turned out by the Government Printing Office since Benedict took charge have had to be reprinted at the expense of the Government. They contained so many errors as to be worthless. The last case of this sort was reported to the Senate by Secretary Endicott last week. This is the direct result of Benedict's narrow ideas of economy.

There was a marble bust of the late Senator John A. Logan on exhibition in what is known as the marble room of the Senate. It is a striking resemblance and attracts much attention. It was made for Mrs. Lofian and will shortly be removed to her residence.

A Fearful Storm.

NEW YORK, March 12.—The hardest snow storm of the year by far is raging in New York City. It began early this morning and at 8 o'clock was a foot or over on the ground. A high wind caused drifts which, in the upper part of the city, were three and four feet high. Traffic was almost suspended. Thousands of passengers were blocked on the elevated roads. The people who left uptown by the elevated roads were unable to get further than Eighth street by the road. Many of the more venturesome descended to the street by ladder and walked the rest of the way down town. People in suburban towns found it almost impossible to reach the city.

An Albany dispatch says: The snow storm in this vicinity is the severest of the season, Horse cars are blocked and trains are hours behind. If the storm continues, of which there is every prospect, there will be a general train blockade before night.

A dispatch from Troy says: About fifteen inches of snow has fallen here and still falling; seventeen inches reported at Saratoga. Railroad men believe that they have not seen the worst of the storm, however, and predict a very serious time if the wind increases.

Business is virtually at a standstill. Down-town houses are almost deserted. Only two trains arrived with the mails this morning and work at the postoffice was paralyzed. The carriers made two trips, but in many cases had to bring the mail back, owing to business offices being closed. Postmaster Harrison said he had not seen such a blockade for a number of years. All the telegraph and telephone wires in the city are in bad working order. Hundreds of wires are down, having been broken by the mass of ice and snow. The ferry-boats between New York and Brooklyn and New Jersey are running once in an hour or less.

The storm is increasing and is unprecedented. All business has been paralyzed at Stock Exchange,

The weather has stopped the courts, jurors and witnesses in a murder case being unable to arrive.

Every street car in New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City and the elevated trains are stopped. The Brooklyn bridge and ferries have been almost abandoned. Down-town hotels are crammed with suburbanites. The The elevated roads run three thousand trains daily usually, and have never been obliged to stop. Of forty mails due between four o'clock and noon only two arrived by two in the afternoon.

A Canajahorie dispatch says: Snow has fallen in the Mohawk Valley for twenty-four hours and high winds have banked it in the highways, Railroad trains are greatly delayed,

MIDNIGHT—Storm unabated and as furious as ever, but the snow has stopped falling. Snow drifts in the business streets are as deep as in the country districts. Grown persons here never saw the like. But meagre reports are received from uptown districts, but in the lower precincts where reporters managed to struggle through the snow against the wind, more than one hundred fractures of the limbs and concussions of the skull were reported. The ambulance horses and different hospitals were completely fagged early in the night and calls in many cases could not be responded to.

Mills and His Tariff-Smasher.

That it was carefully drawn for the purpose of holding the Southern vote, which the Democrats see is wavering, is very apparent.—Lynn Item.

The fact is the bill is dangerous. It threatens every industry it touches, and it is to be doubted whether it would reduce the revenue a dollar.—Haverhill Gazette.

What the Mills bill may bring forth in the way of relief if it becomes a law no man can say with reasonable certainty, and for this reason it should not become a law.—Boston Advertiser.

It will be remarkable, indeed, if the bill, affecting as it does so many important interests, commands the unanimous and unfaltering support of the Democrats as it now stands.—Cincinnati Inquirer.

It bears evidence on its face that it is the outcome of a compromise between contending interests to such an extent that nobody is likely to be altogether satisfied with its provisions.—Newport News.

Wool is put on the free list, while the duty on woolens is cut in more than one place, and in such a way that the woolen manufacturers whom the committee predicted would be so joyful will not be slow in making a loud protest.—Nashua Telegraph.

The ruling principle which has governed the preparation of the bill appears to have been a desire to placate the protectionists Democrats in the South and the Democratic party in places where it feels the need of special help for the coming campaign.—Springfield Union.

This bill is a campaign documont pure and simple. It is daubed with the honey of free tradism just sufficiently to catch that element, is crystallized with the sugar of the raw material idea, and just fringed with a little protection to make the dish presentable.—Harrisburg Call.

It is a deliberate blow at the industries of the United States—a deliberate attempt to break them down in the interest of Foreign trade. The adoption of this measure would increase—largely increase—the income of the government instead of reducing it.—Washington Republican.

The bill is constructed upon free trade principles, and goes as far in the direction of free trade as was expected. It proposes absolute free trade in some of the products of this country that give employment to hundreds of thousands of men, and strikes the severest blow possible at many of our most important industries.—Cleveland News and Herald.

The Mills tariff bill can be summarized as follows: Everything the South wants free is free. The reduction of the revenue is brought about by slashing into the Northern States regardless of consequences. But then, what would you expect of a Southern free trade caucus?—Boston Record.

The German Emperor died on Friday of last week.

Arrested for Wrecking a Train.

On the morning of the 11th day of April, 1881, an emmigrant train was wrecked near Oakland, but fortunately no lives were lost and but slight injuries sustained by any of the passengers. Every effort was made at the time by the railroad company and the civil authorities of this county to ferret out the perpetrators, without avail. The B. O. detectives, however, never gave up the search. A few weeks ago Mr. Eugene E. Grannon obtained a clue which finally lead to the arrest of George Grim, near Terra Alta, Monday, and of William Enlow, at Hambleton, W. Va., Tuesday. They were brought to Oakland and given a hearing before Esquire Gonder, who committed them to jail, in default of $2,000 each, to await the action of the Grand Jury in May. They were charged on the oath of Eugene E. Grannon, who made the arrests, with having on the 11th day of April, 1881, "broken the McGowan Switch, and then and there removed the cross-ties on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, near Oakland Garrett county, Md., with intent to overthrow a train of cars, and actually caused the total wreck of a train loaded with emmigrants."

At the time of the occurrence both of the accused resided at Catonsville, a suburb of Oakland, the scene of the wreck. They are both married men, with families. Enlow was raised in this county, is about forty years old, belongs to a good family, and was always considered a good citizen. Grim is about thirty years of age, was from West Virginia, and only resided here a few years, going back to that State. They both worked on the B. & O. for some time after the wreck, but were not working for the Company at the time. Much sympathy is expressed in this community for the families and relatives of these unfortunate men, who each charges the other with the commission of this great crime.

JOHN SHARTZER.

Death of Mrs. Elizabeth Watson.

A heavy gloom has been cast over the hearts of the people of this community by the sad intelligence of the death of Mrs. Watson. Deceased was born Dec. 30th, 1820, and died March 8, 1888, aged 67 years, 2 months and 8 days. Just two years ago Mother Watson was stricken with a cancerous trouble. Her maiden name was Spurgin. About 46 years ago she was married to Mr. John Watson. In early life she joined the Baptist church to which she was most ardently attached. As a companion, she was faithful and true; as a mother, she was affectionate and kind; as a neighbor, benevolent and accommodating, and she was highly esteemed by all those who knew her. She leaves a husband, two sons and three daughters to mourn her loss. Her memory, sweet and fragrant with christian living, gives the sombre cloud of grief that now overshadows the desolate home of the bereaved a silver lining. Her home was a christian home and her family was a godly family. Then truly it may be said, "She hath done what she could." What a beautiful lesson such a life teaches young women! To have lived almost seventy years—to have lived almost fifty years with the husband of one's youth, and then to be laid by loving hands into an honored grave amid the tears and respect of all who knew her—it is surely a life worthy the study and the imitation of young women.

The funeral services were conducted by her pastor in charge, Rev. Hart, at the house, after which the body was conveyed to the family graveyard and interred to await its ressurrection.

Her lovely form in dust they laid,
Where now it sleeps among the dead,
To suffer nevermore.
Her ransomed spirit, freed from clay,
On angels' wings has fled away
To yonder golden shore.

Deer Park.

"The stormy March has come at last," and we are having genuine winter weather, doubtless that we may better appreciate the "balmy spring" when it comes.

Mrs. D. F. Graham returned from Piedmont on Saturday last, having spent the greater part of the winter there.

Mrs. P. W. Connell has been quite ill lately but is now improving.

Mrs. L. H. Schoolfield has just returned from a visit to Piedmont.

Miss Bessie Hoye is recovering from a recent severe illness.

Col. E. C. Tillson celebrated his 81st birthday Tuesday. Nearly all of his children and grandchildren were present. His activity and general good health, so unusual in one of his advanced age, make it easy for his friends to believe that their wishes of "many happy returns" will be fulfilled. He has four children, sixteen grandchildren, and one great-grandchild—the young daughter of Mrs. F. S. Landstreet. The little representation of the fourth generation would have been present if the inclement weather had not prevented.

The pastor of the M. E. Church has just closed a protracted meeting.

Mrs. J. S. Laughlin has opened a public school here.

The Fruits of Victory.

(From the New York World.)

A Western Democratic journal takes The World to task for resisting the attempt to commit the Democratic party to the spoils theory. It insists that a party is entitled to the "Fruits of Victory."

But what are the "fruits of victoro?" Did the Democratic party, with its five million voters, maintain its organization and its spirit through years of defeat simply or chiefly to lift 100,000 men into office?

The Democratic party, representing a majority of the people, was entitled to the fruits of its victory, and it is a pity that it has not enjoyed more of them. It fought for a reduction of taxes, for a prevention of the surplus, for a cessation of the extravagance caused by an "overflowing Treasury."

Not one of these fruits has been gathered.

The Democratic party fought to prevent the public service from being prostituted to partisan uses and to free elections from the domination of office-holders. In this it has been partially successful, and would have been more so if President Cleveland had removed a few Democratic officials for defiant violation of his orders.

The Democratic party contended for an opportunity to break up the plundering rings in the Government, to compel derelicit railroad corporations to respect their obligations, to check the growing influence of plutocrats in public affairs and to break the power of monopolies.

The boughs have been shaken, but how few of these fruits have been actually gathered!

It is said by a writer in the New York Sun that "not less than one million people were drowned by the terrible floods in the Hong-Ho river, which overwhelmed several thousands of Chinese villages in October last. The fact that this appalling tragedy has not profundly moved all Christendom shows how little we know of the lives, the sufferings and joys of people who are not closely connected with us by ties of interest and affinity. Still, this very calamity shows that widely removed parts of the world are drawing nearer together. This same river thirty-six years ago involved China in a calamity of equally terrible proportions, and so great was then our ignorance of that country and its affairs that five years elapsed before attention was called to the disaster in this country and Europe. The river cut for itself a new bed far north of its previous course, and seven years after the disaster European geographers were talking of the lost Hoang-Ho river, and wondering what had become of it. At the present rate of progress we may expect in time to see the daily news of China laid on our breakfast table along with the other news of the world."

The month of February, 1866, was in one respect the most remarkable in the world's history. It had no full moon. January had two full moons, and so had March, but February had none. Do you realize what a rare thing in nature that was? It had not occurred since the time of Washington, nor since the discovery of America, nor since the beginning of the Christian era, nor the creation of the world. And it will not occur again, according to the computation of astronomers, for—how long do you think?—2,500,000 years. Was not that truly a wonderful month?—Golden Days.

"Ma, what is hush?" asked a little boy. "Why my dear do you ask?" "Because I asked sister Jane what made her dress stick out so behind, and she said 'hush.'

GLAMOUR LAND.

Ah, dim, lost Glamour-land!
On whose confines I stand,
Longing for home that home shall be no more!
There stood my palace grand,
Where now, on either hand,
The fiery swords of seraphs guard the door.

There once I roamed to cull
Dear hopes more beautiful
Than siren thoughts that musing monks resist:
Nothing too far or fair
But its mirage was there
Pictured upon the valley's rosy mist.

There each sweet day I heard
Songs of a brooding bird,
Telling of purest pleasure yet to be:
There, by the singing streams,
Faint forms of darling dreams
Loitered and lingered hand in hand with me.

Ah, dim, dear fancy-land!
Thy, welkin, rainbow-spanned,
The softened light of halcyon hours o'er-past,
Fading away, away,
All the expanse is gray—
As fades the summer moon, too fair to last.

THE PANTHER SLAYER.

The Greatest One of All His Great Exploits.

There is still an occasional panther seen, but more frequently heard without being seen, prowling about the lumber camps of the Susquehanna basin, and making its presence apparent by raids on sheep and even cattle among the sparsely settled farm localities of Sullivan and adjacent counties. The advance of civilization has not been so rapid among these dense pine and hemlock wildernesses to have alone caused the panther to abandon its haunts in those forests, for there are still inaccessible jungles and wild, rocky retreats, so well loved by this boldest and fiercest of the great cat family, where it might hide itself with almost, if not quite, as much security as it did in earlier years; but civilization was aided by a band of inveterate and cunning woodsmen who passed their lives almost solely in carrying on an offensive warfare against the panther, following it even to its remotest and most dangerous haunts, and engaging it there fearlessly, and with tactics which they had reduced to an exact science. It was the perpetual and unrelenting crusade of this band of woodsmen that gradually reduced the once numerous race of panthers in these woods to a condition of almost absolute extinction, so that to-day, with conditions favorable not only to its existence, but to its increase, it is only at rare intervals that the blood-curdling cry of this once monarch of the woods is heard among its old haunts, and, rarer still, that the dreaded possessor of the voice is seen.

Captain Brown was probably the most famous of the old-time panther slayers. He was an early settler at the Forks of the Loyalsock Creek, near what is now the mountain village of Forksville, Sullivan County, where he put up a cabin and spent his time in hunting. He was the panther scourge of a wide region, and his cabin was the first place that was visited by the settlers thereabouts when a panther had bereft some one of them of a much-treasured sheep or cow, the visit being to beg Captain Brown to come and rid their particular locality of the marauding beast. Among the hundreds of tales of daring and persistence manifested by the great pioneer hunter one is recounted with especial pride by descendants of his.

Among the first to seek the then unknown and unbroken region about the forks of the Loyalsock was a settler named Samuel Rogers. One morning Rogers appeared in great trepidation at Captain Brown's cabin, just as that hunter was rigging himself up for a day's tramp among the panther haunts. Rogers said that a big panther had broken into his sheepfold the night before and had carried off his most highly prized ram. Rogers was a good panther hunter himself, but he implored Brown to accompany him in the chase. It was one of Brown's eccentricities that he never hunted in company with anybody, and he refused to go with Rogers. But he said:

"Now, you go home, Rogers, and keep cool. I won't go with you after that big panther, but I'll go out myself and kill it for you, and hope I'll have a chance to get it's mate, too."

That was satisfactory to Rogers, and Captain Brown took his gun and went at once to the woods on the flats at the forks of the creek.

It was late in the fall, and there was a light snow on the ground. At the edge of the creek he struck the fresh track of a panther in the snow. From the unusual size of the footprints and drops of blood here and there along the trail, the blood having come from some animal the panther had secured and was carrying away, Brown knew that he had located the big sheep-stealer which had been in Settler Rogers' fold.

It is the habit of panthers, like all of the cat family, to bury what is left from a feast, to be exhumed and eaten on some future occasion. Brown knew that by following the trail, if he did not overtake the panther itself, he would come to the spot where it had buried the remains of the sheep, and that by waiting near that spot he would be sure to get a shot, not only at the one panther, but more than likely at its mate, which the former would fetch along to join in devouring the mutton. The hunter followed the trail for a long distance, and finally, on the edge of a dense laurel thicket, found where the panther had buried the sheep. Before preparing himself to hide for the coming of the game, he instinctively glanced up among the tops of the tall trees bordering the swamp, and discovered the panther, his huge length stretched along a limb near the top of one of the trees, and his eyes fixed on the hunter below. Brown raised his rifle to fire, but the agile animal sprang to another tree top, and so swift were his movements that he escaped from the sight of the hunter, who could only follow the line of the beast's retreat by the swaying of the tree tops as the panther leaped from one to another. The course the panther took was toward Doubling Run, and Brown made his way as rapidly as he could through the intervening thicket, and when he reached the run he found that the panther had come down from the trees and had taken a course through the snow toward Lewis Lake, now the mountain summer resort of Eagle's Mere.

The tireless hunter followed the trail through the dense forest, and it led him straight to the lake, a distance of five miles, and around the southern shore for two miles more, when Brown discovered his game drinking from the lake. The present site of the Eagle's Mere steamboat landing is pointed out as the spot where the great panther stood and received Captain Brown's first bullet. The shot did not disable the panther, and it sprang into the laurels and again disappeared, leaving the echoes of its yells reverberating about the rocky shores of the lake. The course of the panther lay toward the outlet of the lake, and Captain Brown followed through the dense growths of laurels. When he came to the outlet he discovered the panther half buried in the soft mud at the edge of the water. It was treating the wound it had received, as is the instinct of wild animals of its kind. The hunter did not wait for the panther to enjoy the benefit of the healing mud, but sent another bullet after his first. Again the tenacious beast sprang into the thicket, but Captain Brown's quick eye saw that his last shot had been an effective one, and he still followed the trail, now marked by blood. From the direction the wounded animal took the skillful woodsman knew that it was making for the rocky recesses further down the course of the outlet, at a spot now famous as the Rainbow Falls. There the creek flows through a deep ravine, and the faces of the rocks are cut and seamed by fissures and deep ravines.

The hunter, now sure of his trophy, followed more leisurely than he had, and when he came to the head or top of the falls, where a perpendicular rock towers nearly fifty feet above the stream, at its base being a roomy but dark cavarn, he saw the enormous body of the panther stretched on the ground at the mouth of the cave. Brown clambered along the rocks which hugged the water so closely that passage was difficult and dangerous, and at last reached the flat rock which covers a space of several feet between the cave and the water's edge. The ways of panthers were well known to the hunter, as he had learned them by rough experience; but he was so certain that this great beast that lay stretched at the mouth of its den had died in its efforts to reach that retreat that he laid down his gun, and taking his knife from its sheath advanced upon the prostrate beast to claim its magnificent skin as his reward for the long chase. He reached the side of the panther, and was about to bend down and commence stripping it of its skin, when the great beast sprang to its feet as quick as lightning, and with a yell that almost deafened the surprised hunter, threw itself upon him. The force of the shock threw Brown several feet away, off the rock. It was not only a blow that the panther gave him, but as the infuriated animal struck it buried its long claws in the hunter's thick buckskin shirt and ripped it from him from neck to waist. Brown still retained his knife in his grasp and struggled to quickly regain his feet. He rose to his knees, and as he did so the crouching panther leaped toward him. Quick as a flash the wary hunter threw himself on his back on the ground. But for that the panther, flying through the air with wonderful velocity, would have struck him and carried him along in the flight. As it was, the panther passed over him.

Rapidly as the panther's leap carried it through the air, Brown's eye and hand were quicker still. The hunter's keen, long-bladed knife, thrust upward as the huge body of the panther was passing over him as he lay, was plunged almost to the hilt in the animal. The thrust was between the fore legs, but the knife was not withdrawn, and its keen edge, buried in the panther's flesh, passed the entire length of the great animal's body, and the panther fell dead and disemboweled fifteen feet beyond the spot where Brown lay covered with blood that had poured upon him from the frightful wounds of his now vanquished foe.

The hunter jumped to his feet, and was eying with grim satisfaction the completeness of his work, when a cry, of which he at once knew the significance, echoed among the rocks. He sprang to where his gun lay, and seizing it, looked in the direction of the cry. There, crouching on the summit of Cavern Rock, her eyes glaring, and her long tail swaying in that deliberate, snake-like movement that denotes the fury of the cat and its kind, was the mate of the great panther that had just met his death. The mate plainly comprehended the situation, and did not tarry in her efforts for vengeance. With a frightful yell she launched herself from the rocky peak in a furious leap for the hunter, who stood near the water's edge. His bullet met the vengeful panther in mid-air and passed through her heart. The impetus of her leap carried her to the spot where she had intended to fall upon the hunter and bury her fangs in his throat, but she fell dead at the water's edge where her enemy had stood.

Brown skinned the two panthers and started back for his cabin. The course he took led him to the spot where the big panther had buried Samuel Roger's sheep that morning. As he neared it he heard the growling and snarling made by panthers while devouring their food. He approached cautiously, and peered through the bushes. A male and female panther were busily engaged in making a meal off of the sheep. Brown shot one of the panthers dead as it ate. Its mate sprang into the very tree in which the hunter had first discovered the big one earlier in the day. It paused on a branch and looked back at its dead mate. As it gazed Brown reloaded his rifle. The panther in the tree presented a favorable mark. Brown fired, and the panther fell from limb to limb, clutching at each in its death struggles, and at last tumbled to the ground and died. Six hours from the time Captain Brown had left his cabin in the morning, after traveling more than twenty miles through swamps, tangled woods and high mountains, he was back again, with four of the biggest panther skins ever stripped from the backs of any animals of their kind in the old Lycoming woods. That day's work of the king of the panther slayers is related as the greatest of all the exploits of the great hunter of the Loyalsock.

DARING ROBBERIES.

Burglaries Planned With Astonishing Care and Circumspection.

A few weeks ago the residence of a Mr. Greenfel, at Taplow Court, England, was entered and jewelry, principally bridal presents, valued at $25,000 carried off. The time was the servants' supper hour. There was no one in the second story of the mansion. The burglars entered, took the property, and departed without making any noise or leaving the smallest article by which any clew could be obtained. There was not the slightest suspicion against any of the servants or any one living in the neighborhood. No strangers had been seen about the place for months.

Still it was evident that the burglars knew every thing about the house, from top to bottom. They were familiar with the habits of the family, the time for taking meals and the location of articles about the place. They must have known exactly where the jewelry was kept. They had planned their expedition with as great care as ever a great military commander did a campaign. They had arranged for their advance, and for their retreat, if one was found necessary. They had fastened every door and window in the lower story. They had stretched fine copper wires under the grass all over the lawn, so that persons would be tripped up if they tried to overtake them. It seemed likely that the robbery was planned shortly after a fashionable marriage occurred and the London and provincial papers published accounts of the costly bridal presents. Evidently weeks had been spent in making preparations for the robbery.

The history of crime, like that of other events, is likely to repeat itself. A London paper, from which this information is obtained, states that a similar burglary occurs in Great Britain every year. The house robbed is always at some distance from a large town, so that the inmates entertain no fear of robbers. The occupants of the house are always wealthy and generally unsuspicious people. The articles stolen are rarely if ever found. They are not disposed of at pawnshops or to common dealers. They are not offered for sale in country towns. They cannot be found in any of the cities on the continent. Jewelers who made the articles can always recognize them.

It seems likely that the persons engaged in these robberies are possessed of means sufficient to enable them to live for years. It is also likely that they keep the articles they steal till the persons who would be able to recognize them die or lose their recollection of them. It is presumed that many of the articles stolen are sent to America or India. It seems probable that there is an international arrangement for disposing of these goods. Warning people against leaving valuable jewelry and plate unprotected appears to do no good. They may be locked up in a vault or safe for a few months, but at the end of this time they are left on tables as before. The skillful professional burglars know this and make their calculations accordingly.—Chicago Times.

Of Small Consequence.

A Chicago belle was riding in a Boston horse car the other day when she suddenly stooped over and began searching for something she had evidently dropped in the straw at her feet.

A half dozen of the polite young gentlemen, for whom Boston is proverbial, sprang to the pretty girl's assistance.

"Ah, have you lost something?" they asked in chorus, as six pair of hands began shaking up the straw.

"It is of no consequence," said the Chicago girl, smiling sweetly. "Don't go to any trouble about it; I've got a whole box more at home. It was only my gum I dropped."

Six polite gentlemen resumed their seats in silence.—Detroit Free Press.

DAKOTA JOURNALISM.

How an Unenterprising Editor Lost His Hold on the Community.

"Have you a newspaper here?" I asked of a man who came over to where we were camped on the edge of a little Dakota town.

"Yes, got one; did have two, but the other feller pulled out last week."

"Didn't it pay?"

"Naw, he wa'n't no good—got out the weakest paper you ever seen."

"What was the trouble with it?"

"No news, or least none to 'mount to any thing. Course, if something big happened that he couldn't help seein' he'd git it in, but ev'ry week there'd be a whole lot o' spicy things that he'd keep still's a mouse about, an' stick in a lot o' pieces on free trade, or protection, or mebby sometimes the tariff. But the other man wa'n't that style—no blowin' pieces in his'n, but all the spicy an' interestin' news that happened."

"So you froze the long editorial man man out?"

"Had to do it, I tell you—he didn't know enough to pound sand. W'y, lemme tell you a little case: Couple o' months' ago I built me a new chicken-coop—not a very big un, 'cause I only got six hens an' a fightin' rooster—but I made it very keerful an' put in two round roosts an' whitewashed 'em, an' three nests. I figured on half the hens restin' au' scratchin' while the other shift was layin', an' nailed some slats over a box in one corner to shut up the setters in an' make 'em quit their monkey bus'ness, an' fixed her up in style generally. Pretty soon old Cooper, this man that's gone, come along an' I called him in an' says I: 'Jes' get onto the new hen-house I been a-buildin.' 'That looks first-rate,' says he. 'Wiggle it,' says I. He wiggled it. 'It 'pears solid,' says he. 'I claim it's the best hen-house in the city,' says I. 'Wouldn't wonder,' says he. Then he walked off with his head down, a-thinkin', I reckoned, what he should say 'bout it. Somehow I didn't manage to see the other feller to tell him 'bout it, but Lordy, how do you think it come out?"

"Haven't any idea. How did it?"

"W'y, sir, I went over to Hank George's an' borrowed his copy of Cooper's paper soon's it come out—Hank hadn't got alook at it yet himself—an' took it home an' waded through it, but not a line 'bout my hen-coop! Not a line! Not a word! Didn't say nothing 'bout it—my name wasn't in the paper! I went so fur as to even read clear through a long piece on 'Our Common School System,' thinkin' mebby that he stuck in something 'bout my hen-house in it somewheres, but he hadn't. Well, I was mad, an' I think I had a right to be. I throwed the paper down an' didn't even take it back to Hank. But next mornin' when I seen one of the other feller's papers down in the store my eyes stuck out so you could 'a' hung your hat on 'em. There it was in his paper 'bout my hen-coop big's a Mexican dollar! It read like this: 'We hear that Uncle Abner Doty has jes' completed a large an' convenient hen-house for his fine flock of Shanghis, Bramys, Plymouth Rocks, an' so forth, together with his famous fightin' rooster, Ben Butler. We have not yet had the pleasure of samplin' any of the eggs laid in this new henhouse, but we know that Uncle Abner is not the man to long forget ye editor.' That's the very way he had it, word for word, name an' all. Jes' soon's I read it I went right out an' told ev'rybody we couldn't 'ford to support Old Cooper no longer 'cause he was hurtin' the town by not mentionin' the improvements, and I jes' kep' up the talk till what little bus'ness he did have dropped off an' nobody wouldn't have nothing to do with him, an' he's left. You can see yourself that we couldn't very well do any thing else after the way he used me on that hen-house."—F. H. Carruth, in Chicago Tribune.

KEPT HIS PROMISE.

A Small Boy Saved from a Ruined Life by a Kind Word.

I remember a case that happened years ago in Illinois. A lawyer friend of my father defended a lad for stealing apples. The owner of the orchard was without pity, but the lawyer pleaded that the child's act was merely one of gluttony and that he ought to be indulgently treated. This was the view of the matter taken by the justice and he spoke to the accused in a fatherly way.

"You hear," he said, "what has been said about you, that you are no thief; now I am going to acquit you, but you must first promise that in future you will behave in a way to redeem this fault you have committed."

"The boy, who had been crying bitterly, looked up, wiped away his tears, and gave the required answer in a firm voice. Years passed away. One day as the lawyer stepped off the train at Detroit he was accosted by a gentleman who asked if he remembered him.

"No, I do not recall ever having seen you before," was his reply.

"Well, I am the little apple thief whom you once defended. I want to let you know that I have kept the promise I made on that occasion. I now own a wagon factory in this place, am a married man and the happy father of several children. It is to you and the good justice of that day that I am indebted for all this. I am sure that had I been sent to the reform school I would very likely have grown up to be any thing but an honest man."—Cor. N. O. Picayune.

TEMPERANCE READING.

MY VISION.

"Look Not Upon the Wine When It Is Red."

"Look not upon the wine when it is red,"
The preacher said—
"Nor when it gives its color in the cup;"
A fiend, the poisoned chalice hath filled up,
And he that drinks, drinks misery and death.
* * * * * * *
But once I gazed into its ruddy tide;
The fiend stood by my side:
Upon my cheek I felt his blighting breath,
And as I gazed, he laughed with hellish glee,
And whispered: "Take the gift I proffer thee;
'Twill rouse thy heart,
And bid its pulses start
With joyous life, and thrill
Each nerve with new delight;
'Twill fill
The earth with beauty and the heavens with light."

Spell-bound, I gazed into the fatal bowl,
And saw a sight that thrilled my inmost soul—
What saw I in the bowl? Be patient, friend,
And hear me to the end.
'Twas not a sight that thou would'st care to see;
And seen but once, 'twould haunt thy memory.
And, as a fever dream, return again
To mock with shapes of dread the dazed brain.
Wraiths of the living, spectres of the dead—
Behold they come, a ghastly, gloomy train—
* * * * * *
O look not on the wine when it is red
Lest forms of dread
Arise
From its red depths to blast and blight thine eyes.
"Look not," the preacher said—
"Look not upon the wine when it is red."

O I have seen in waters clear and bright
The glorious upper world of bloom and light,
The nodding spires of grass, the swaying trees,
And heaven's azure flecked with argosies
Of silver clouds; and all things true and fair
Were mirrored there;
And I have even
In deep dark wells beheld the light of heaven,
Bright in reflection as the orbs that roll
In majesty above.
What saw I in the bowl?
'Twas not the waving grasses, dewy bright,
The nodding trees, the clouds, the stars of night.
No! Darker visions swept before my sight.
Ah! well the preacher said:
"Look not upon the wine when it is red."

As the magician sees before him pass
Demons of darkness mirrored in his glass,
The shrouded, ghastly tenants of the grave,
And the dread underworld of mystery,
So I, when gazing at the wine which gave
The crimson hue that dyes the sunset wave,
Saw that which hath been, is, and yet shall be;
Saw sights, would God I never more might see—
Saw stars go out on earth to shine no more—
Saw shattered wrecks upon a storm-beat shore—
Saw ships go down before the tempest's wrath—
Saw hopeless ruin in the whirlwind's path.
Brave hopes and high
Had perished utterly.
Glory was quenched in shame, and love in hate;
The fairest homes of earth were desolate,
Of love, of hope, of happiness bereft.
Ah! what was left?
Edens, from which the bloom of life had fled,
Gardens of roses growing thorns instead,
And visions of the dying and the dead,
Were pictured in the wine when it was red.

I saw a palace radiant and fair,
Its marble walls bedight with sculptures rare,
And, gathered in its halls, the young and gay
To speed in revelry the hours away.
"Pour out the wine," the insidious tempter cried,
'Twas the same fiend that halted by my side.
"Pour out the wine; each emptied glass fill up."
Ah! how it gave its color in the cup.
Each goblet flashed aloft its baleful red,
A death-lit flame! With its ensanguined tide
The snowy marble of the walls was dyed,
As in the glow of conflagrations dire,
As in the light of hell's intensest fire.
The end was near; dreamlike the vision sped;
The palace lay in ruins o'er its dead.
This saw I in the wine when it was red.

I saw a thousand homes made desolate
By the red hand of murder. Pitiless fate,
Binding his victims, gave them unto death,
And life and beauty withered at a breath.
Alas for the despair
Of stricken ones! Alas! the young and fair,
Beauty with golden hair,
Childhood with dimpled face,
Youth with unconscious grace,
Faded life's morning bloom, its glory fled,
And mothers clasping in a long embrace
Within their pulseless arms their murdered dead,
This saw I in the wine when it was red.

I saw a million graves,
Earth furrowed with them, as the sea with waves;
Graves, not of those who passed away in pride,
But who, in abject misery, drank and died;
Graves of the nameless, unremembered dead;
The raindrops are the tears above them shed;
Heaven weeps for them, human lids are dry.
Men shun the fields unconsecrate
Where they forgotten lie;
Or haply point a moral by their fate,
To warn the passer-by,
To shun the paths which they were lured to tread.
To look not on the wine when it is red.

I saw the small and great,
Before the judgment seat
Waiting the verdict of the last great day.
In far-off fields of air,
Unclouded and serene,
The jasper walls of holy Heaven were seen.
White-robed and fair
The throngs of the forgiven soared away,
And through the pearly portals passed for aye.
For aye forgiven.

But oh, for those the hapless slaves of sin
That stood below unshriven,
Waiting in vain the mandate: "Enter in,"
For everywhere,
Upon the gather ng clouds, the darkening air,
Was writ the lurid sentence of despair:
"No drunkard ever shall inherit Heaven,"
And these the nether darkness swallowed up.
Ah! well the preacher said:
"Look not upon the wine when it is red,
And when it gives its color in the cup."

And yet I looked upon the wine, alas!
It was no horrid vision of the night,
Or picture shadowed in the magic glass,
Of figures moving to and fro,
Through scenes of deepening woe,
That pass and are not, for I felt the might
Of him, the fiend who tempted me to drink—
The fiend who forged my fetters link by link,
And bound me till in utter agony
I writhed, and moaned, and struggled to be free.
I was aware
Of countless beings in the invisible air,
Of damned souls that shrieked in their despair,
Demons that came
From hell's abysses, breathing breath of flame.
* * * * * *
Above, Heaven's golden gates were opened wide;
Below me yawned the grave.
Falling, as from a battlement, I cried:
O God, is there no hand to save!
None, none; then let me from the dead
Shout to the living, as they tread
The maze of mirth, and bow at pleasure's shrine:
"Look not, look not upon the wine
When it is red."

AGITATION may be the life of trade, but it is the death of the liquor trade. Therefore agitate.—Voice.

"IN MODERATION."

The Voice of Science as to the Injurious Influence of "Nipping Upon Health"—Total Abstinence the Only Sure Temperance.

The disapproval of the "abuse" of intoxicating beverages has become very general. This disapproval is very often expressed in one form or another by moderate drinkers, and is even fervently reiterated from time to time by the brewers, distillers and saloon-keepers. But it is refreshing to find high medical authorities inviting public attention to the fact that even moderate drinking is injurious to health, and therefore itself an "abuse."

The Medical Record, of this city, calls attention, in articles which the Scientific American reprints entire and thus emphasizes, to a late discussion of this subject by Dr. Harley, the English hepatologist and nephrologist, in the Provincial Medical Journal. Dr. Harley's significant article is entitled "The Influence of 'Nipping' upon Health," and in it he considers the injurious effects of drinking alcoholic beverages "in moderation." Comparing, in the registrar-general's report, the mortality tables of men exposed to the temptation of frequent "nipping" with those of men not similarly exposed, the result is, he says, "startling in the extreme, more particularly as regards the proportion of liver diseases." The rate of mortality is found to be six times greater among those whose business is practically inseparable from "nipping" than among those representing all the other industries combined. After the liver, the kidneys, the heart and the nervous system become most frequently affected in moderate drinkers. Dr. Harley says that "it is not difficult to understand why the liver, of all organs of the body, should be the most affected by 'nipping,' when it is remembered that almost every drop of alcohol taken into the stomach is absorbed by the branches of the portal veins, is conveyed directly to the liver, and has to filter through its tissues ere it can get into the general circulation, and by it become distributed to the other organs of the body." That the kidneys suffer less than the liver is presumed to be due to the fact that less alcohol reaches them, yet it is in part eliminated by these organs, and Dr. Harley claims to have obtained "pure alcohol" from the kidneys of persons who have died intoxicated, by the simple process of distillation. The bad effect of "nipping" upon the heart consists in inviting disease in the predisposed, as well as in augmenting disease which already exists.

Dr. Harley also believes that alcohol taken in small quantities at a time, but frequently repeated, acts deleteriously upon the nervous system by keeping the blood-vessels on the stretch, by engorging them and causing them to press upon the nerve-cells and fibrils. This, it is claimed, interferes both with the proper performance of their functions and with nutrition.

The nerves also suffer indirectly through the action of alcohol on the blood. Dr. Harley has found that, even in the small proportion of five per cent., "alcohol exerts a powerful chemical effect on blood, so powerful as to entirely derange one of its most important functions—namely, the function of respiration." "The alcohol," he says, "seems to act like an asphyxiant, inasmuch as it not alone diminishes the power of the red corpuscles to absorb oxygen, but to exhale carbonic acid, and that, too, in the same way (though to a somewhat less extent) as morphia does. This peculiar action of alcohol on the blood nerve-pabulum may be thought to give a reasonable explanation of the paralyzing action of alcohol upon the nervous system.

The five per cent. of alcohol thus declared by a scientific expert to have so serious a chemical effect upon the blood is about the average quantity contained in beer. In the light of this very suggestive and important medical and scientific discussion of the subject, the reason becomes obvious why beer risks are avoided by life insurance companies, why the so-called moderate drinker, as well as the heavier toper, is guilty of the "abuse" of intoxicants, and why total abstinence therefrom is the only true Temperance. — National Temperance Advocate.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

A TEMPERANCE society has been formed in the Girls' Mission School, Samokoy, Turkey. The white ribbon is donned by its members, and all have enrolled their names upon the World's W. C. T. U. petition.

THE world's petition, which provides for the abolition of alcohol and narcotics, is meeting with great favor in the Orient and in Australia. This petition will be presented for signature to all influential bodies in America this year.—N. W. Christian Advocate.

REV. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, preaching in the St. James' Hall, said that the destruction of the liquor traffic and the investment of its capital in legitimate branches of industry would give work to every unemployed and starving man and woman in England at the present time.

AN enterprising grocery firm of Kirksville, Mo., makes the following offer: "Any man who drinks two drams of whisky per day for a year, and pays 10 cents a drink for it, can have at our store 30 sacks of flour, 220 pounds of granulated sugar and 72 pounds of good green coffee for the same money and get $2.50 premium for making the change in his expenditures." That is a Temperance lecture in a very few lines.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—A lady in Grant County, Va., aged seventy, recently had an attack of measles, whereby she was cured of rheumatism.

—The depth of snow on the mountains of Colorado is illustrated curiously by stumps of trees. Instead of being cut close to the ground the stumps are from six to ten feet high, since the trees are cut when the snow is upon the ground.

—A Georgia farmer who lives near Kenesaw mountain, with a small branch running through his farm, which you could dam up with a couple spades of dirt, has the following sign stuck up: "Hunting positively forbidden on this place, but you can fish as much as you please."

—It has been estimated that a man would have to consume in every twenty-four hours sixty-seven feet of a sausage nine feet in circumference in order to eat as much in proportion to his bulk as the red-breast, whose daily food is considered as equivalent to an earthworm fourteen feet long.

—A countryman, who had been on a visit to London, on returning home, remarked that he never saw so many trees in his life as he saw in Piccadilly. This led to a dispute and a bet, when the countryman, being called upon to name the trees he saw, replied, "Axle-trees."

—A young man in Caribou, Me., gave two young ladies a ride to singing-school and left them there to get home the best way they could, while he returned with his best girl. The next time the two slighted damsels met the fellow they gave him such a flogging that he was laid up for several days.

—The latest freak in wood fires is the pine cone blaze. No self-respecting open fireplace is now without the woodsy relics of the past summer, and the quaintest gilded baskets come to hold them. A hostess welcomes her visitor by throwing a handful of pine cones into the fire, and then, inspired by their cheery blaze, the gossip and the chatter flow merrily on.

—A traveler in Japan was recently shown the interior of a native printing office. He found a "case" four feet wide by sixty feet long, where twelve compositors worked. They did a wonderful amount of rushing about in search of the types needed, for over fifty thousand different characters reposed in the divisions of this vast construction.

—A French provincial lawyer recently died. In his will he directed that an annuity of $400 a year be paid to the servant who should "close his eyes." When this clause was read the servant who had performed the office jumped with joy, but his delight was speedily dampened by the nephew and heir of the dead man who reminded the servant that his master only had one eye, and the servant actually failed to get his legacy on this absurd technicality.

—A recent funeral in Louisiana was announced by handbills reading as follows: "There will be a large funeral at Frogmore, the grandmother of ——'s wife. All are invited to attend. Ice water in abundance, free to all. Come one, come all." The paper contained the date of the funeral services, the names of six "managers," three of whom were clergymen, and the time of arrival and departure of trains from neighboring stations, with a list of railroad fares.

—A Cape Colonist who had been guilty of indiscreet remarks publishes this card in a local South African newspaper: "I, the undersigned, A. C. du Plessis, C. son, retract hereby everything I have said against the innocent Mr. G. P. Bezuidenhout, calling myself an infamous liar, and striking my mouth with the exclamation: 'You mendacious mouth, why did you lie so?' I declare further that I know nothing against the character of Mr. G. P. Bezuidenhout. I call myself, besides, a genuine liar of the first class."

—Frederick the Great was not only wise, but also very witty. On one occasion a Catholic priest refused to allow an officer who had not complied with all his religious duties, to be buried in consecrated ground. Frederick sent for the priest and asked him: "You say that the graveyard is consecrated?" "Yes, your majesty." "How far down does your consecration go?" The priest, somewhat puzzled, replied, "Five feet." "All right, then, the officer shall be buried six feet under ground. He will then be one foot outside your jurisdiction."

—A Buffalo professor the other day was enlightening his class on the subject of geology, when one of the pupils came forward, handed a piece of rock candy to the professor, and asked what it was. The professor suggested that it was probably a quantity of crystalline quartz, whereupon the boy wondered at its being so crumbly. The scientist then ventured the opinion that the substance was carbonate of lime. Some of the boys could not refrain from giggling outright, but the professor remained in blissful ignorance of the joke.

—Some ingenious individual has organized a "Book Exchange" in Paris which might possibly be imitated with profit in this country. Membership costs 3 francs and 50 centimes (70 cents); that is, the reader buys a book —not in paper covers, but a well-bound volume—and pays this amount in cash. On a fly-leaf he will find a list of "sub-agencies," principally in large hotels, restaurants, etc., where he may upon payment of an additional 50 centimes (10 cents) surrender his book and get another, and so on, ad lib. It is optional at any time for the subscriber to surrender a book definitely and receive 3 francs in payment therefor.

EXTRAVAGANT DRESS.

A Philosophical Consideration of an Important Question.

A love of the beautiful and ornamental need not degenerate into a craving for merely costly luxury. Here we have to investigate the meaning of luxury in dress. Every one will admit that a Brussels lace flounce which has cost fifty thousand hours of labor and the eyesight of more than one worker is a luxury, yet in one whirl of a waltz the queen of the ball-room has sacrificed this costly article. And what advantage does she gain? But what is luxury in one age, in another is a cheap and necessary article of wear. The days are passed when a Prince received a shirt as a fitting gift from a Princess; when cotton there was none, and linen was so dear it was held to be an extravagance to wear a night-dress. Thanks to discoveries and inventions, to machinery and to facilities of transport, woolen, linen and cotton fabrics are within reach of every one, at prices adapted to the slenderest means. Never has it been possible to clothe one's self so warmly and cheaply as in the present day. We can not revert to those days when each class had its special and distinctive dress; we can not accept M. de Lavaleye's counsels of perfection and clothe ourselves in the garb of the religious orders. We must regulate, not repress the love of ornament; we must reject the freaks and follies of fashion and appeal to those whose taste and position enable them to adopt a higher standard, and urge them to set the example of simplicity and frugality, of sense and solvency. It is is singular to contrast the glowing splendor and prodigality of the dress of one sex in this nineteenth century with the sobriety of the dress of the other sex, which has shrunk within our own recollection into a grim uniformity of black kerseymere. The laws of nature are reversed, if it be true, as Mr. Darwin teaches, that the male bird owes the hues of his plumage and the beauty of his form to his desire to please the hens and obtain the honor of natural selection. In modern society it is the hens who carry the gay feathers. Shall we say with the same motives, and with equal success? There was a time when the dress of men was alike wasteful, extravagant and inexpedient; when they wore costly stuffs, rich embroidery, lace, jewels; when at the Court of France the Duke of Buckingham shook off diamonds, and the maids of honor went on their knees to pick them up and appropriate them; when the folds of a cravat and the embroidery of a waistcoat were subjects of earnest attention to the masculine mind. Those days are over, men's dress is simple, suitable, inexpensive. Is it too much to hope that reason may assert her authority in the case of women's dress, as she has done for men, and that while slovenliness is unknown, and the highest standard of neatness is attained, there may be neither waste nor extravagance, but that all-pervading sense of propriety of which Dr. Johnson was the advocate? "Learn," said he, "that there is propriety or impropriety in every thing how slight soever, and get at the general principles of dress and behavior." When Mrs. Thrale asked his opinion of the dress of a child: "Well, sir, how did you like little miss? I hope she was fine enough?" "It was the finery of a beggar," said he; "she looked like a native of Bow Lane dressed up to be carried to Bartholomew Fair." Views which the philosopher and the economist advocate may well gain a hearing, though only now urged by one who has no other claim to an audience than the desire to help in woman's work.—Christian G. J. Reeve, in Longman's Magazine.

FASHIONABLE KINKS.

Some of the New Things Affected by the World of Fashion.

Etchings are in great demand.

Turning down visiting cards is out of date.

The camelia japonica has been restored to favor.

Velvet basques and redingotes are quite fashionable.

Red and gray is a favorite combination in children's dresses.

Braided coiffures are again in vogue, especially the braided coronet or diadem.

Large mantles with Muscovite, religieuse and ambulance sleeves are in great demand.

Russian jewelry, Russian tea, Russian gowns, etc., are having a mild run just now.

The fashionable boutonniere is either a single rose or a bunch of violets, or mayhap as many as three buds.

Moire antique and moire Francaise are oftener chosen for trimming cloth costumes than velvet or plush.

As the season advances the skirts of dresses are less bunched at the back than heretofore and are laid in wider plaits.

Long boas are, if possible, more popular then ever. Otter or beaver is the correct thing with costumes of brown cloth.

Crimson Jacqueminot and Bennett roses, the new Papa Gontier and American beauty, both a rich, rosy pink; the creamy Marechal Niel, and pure white Puritan are all favorites of fashion.

At large and ceremonious dinners, where favors are laid at every plate, each gentleman finds at his a single rose or other flower matching the corsage bouquet at the plate of the lady he takes out.—N. Y. World.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—Pasteur's plan of exterminating rabbits by inoculating them with chicken cholera has been tried at Rheims with success.

—It is stated that several diamonds were found in a meteoric stone, weighing about four pounds, that fell in Krasnolobodsk, Russia. This discovery has set people to examining meteorites with unusual interest.

—The artificial production of chickens is a great industry in Franklin county, Pennsylvania. Over 700 incubators are in operation and the production is from 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 chickens annually.

—A noted scientist has shown to the Ophthalmological society of Hiedelberg his second success in grafting the rabbit's cornea into the human eye. The patient's visual power with the new eye is about one-tenth of the normal, and coarse print may be read.

—Among the almost numberless methods of removing particles from the eye, the following is recommended as an efficient means: Make a loop by doubling a horse-hair. Raise the lid of the eye in which is the foreign particle; slip the loop over it, and placing the lid in contact with the eyeball, withdraw the loop, and the particle will be drawn out with it.—Scientific American.

—The Polytechnical Journal describes a new kind of lubricant. One hundred parts of mineral oil and twenty-five parts of castor oil are mixed thoroughly with sixty to seventy parts of sulphuric acid, and the whole worked with two or three volumes of water. In this condition the composition is allowed to stand some time, the watery layer is then drawn off, and, after remaining undisturbed for several days, it is carefully neutralized with soda or potash.

—It is found that living creatures brought up from sea depths of four miles or more, suffer greatly from the changed conditions of pressure and temperature. At those vast depths the pressure is tremendous, and the temperature is comparatively low. On being brought to the surface, the deep-sea creatures are sometimes torn to pieces by the powerful expansion of their organisms occasioned by decrease in pressure, and "sometimes they absolutely melt away before the eyes of the beholder."

—It is estimated that in the United States alone during the year 1887 there were manufactured and sold about half a million gallons of writing ink and about four thousand tons of printing ink. Of course a considerable quantity of this was exported, and some ink of European manufacture was also imported. But the importation of this article is constantly decreasing as the excellence of the home manufactures improve and the market is supplied by them at a cheaper rate.

—Science has demonstrated that sugar is contained in nearly every vegetable and animal product, the constituent elements of which are known. The sweetness of the different varieties of sugar varies, cane sugar being five times sweeter than beet sugar, beet sugar several times as sweet as grape sugar, and so on. But now a sweet substance has been discovered in coal oil tar which is said to be three hundred times sweeter than cane sugar. This new substance is called saccharine, and one drop of it will sweeten three quarts of water.

WANTED HIM BAD.

An Ex-Congressman Applies for a Position and Gets It.

An unpretentious man entered the office of the proprietor of a great daily newspaper.

"Well, sir, what can I do for you?"

"I have come, sir, to ask for a position as editorial writer on your paper."

"I don't think there is room for another man, still, using a homely phrase, we are ever on the look-out for good timber. Have you done much newspaper work?"

"None, sir."

"But you think that you can shape public sentiment, eh?"

"No, sir."

"Then why do you ask for a place?"

"On account of my fitness."

"Of your fitness? But what does your fitness consist of?"

"My absolute ignorance."

"You are surely a peculiar man. Want a position as editorial writer because you are absolutely ignorant?"

"Yes, sir."

"But of what use is an absolutely ignorant man? What would you propose to do?"

"Write articles on the tariff."

The proprietor caught a quick breath, placed one hand on the table to steady himself, and said: "Of course I want you, but I am surprised to see that you have resigned your seat in Congress."—Arkansaw Traveler.

A JAPANESE GENESIS.

The Oriental Story of the Creation of the Mundane Sphere.

In the beginning all things were in chaos. Heaven and earth were not separated. The world floated in the cosmic mass like a fish in the water, or the yelk in an egg. The ethereal matter sublimed and formed the heavens, while the residuum formed the present earth, from the mold of which a germ sprouted and became a self-animate being, from which sprang all the gods.

On the floating bridge of heaven appeared a man and woman of celestial origin. The male plunged his jeweled spear into the unstable waters beneath them, and withdrawing it, the trickling drops formed an island upon which they descended.

The creative pair, divine man and woman, designing to make this island the pillar for a continent, separated, the male to the left, the female to the right, to make a journey around the island. When they met the woman spoke first, saying: "How joyful to meet a lovely man!"

The man, offended that the first use of the tongue had been by a woman, demanded that the journey be repeated, after which he cried out exultingly: "How joyful to meet a lovely woman."

Thus ensued the proper subjection; and this, according to the ancient idea of Japan, was the origin of the human race and the art of love.—Overland Monthly.

Virginia's Old Powder Horn.

The old "Powder Horn," an historical building at Williamsburg, Va., is in danger of falling in from neglect and decay. It was built by Sir Alexander Spotswood, Governor of the colony, in the first quarter of the eighteenth century, to store supplies in. But its greatest interest arises from the fact that it was the building in which the colonial ammunition was stored in 1775. Lord Dunmore seized the ammunition and moved it on board a man-of-war, the result being "the first gathering of an armed force in the colony in opposition to royal authority." In later years the building was used as a market, church and stable. It was bought of the city authorities in 1866, and its present owner should not allow so interesting a relic of the times that tried men's souls to be destroyed.—Springfield Republican.

GERMAN AND YANKEE.

How an Independent Tin-Peddler Astonished an Unhospitable Teuton.

A German farmer, living in Maryland, was notorious for his stinginess, and had never been known when any one entered his house whilst he was at table to practice those rites of hospitality so common among country people. He was in the habit, however, of getting over the omission by an impudent sort of a turn that was inimitable. If a traveler entered the house about noon, which is the usual hour for dinner with American farmers, who are generally a very hospitable race of people, he would say, in his Anglo-Germanic dialect: "How t'ye do? Heb you make your dinner?" And if he received an affirmative answer, would say: "Well, den, you peats us." If he got a negative answer, his regular response was: "Well, den, we peats you." With this established character, an impudent Yankee tin-peddler once tried an experiment upon his patience. This fellow had a prodigious canine appetite, and was for this reason the dread of the whole circuit in which he was accustomed to sell his tins. He had, therefore, thought it prudent to annex to his perambulations a new district in Maryland; and, hearing of this German farmer, and being in his neighborhood, he, one day, presented himself just at the dinner hour. "How t'ye do? Heb you make your dinner?" said the farmer. "I guess I have," answered the peddler. "Well, den, you peats us," he replied. "You see," said the Yankee, "I am one of those critters that likes his dinner as soon as he can get it; howsumdever, I'll jest take a look at your taters till the woman has done, and then, perhaps, we can trade a little." Upon this he sat down, and helping himself to one-half of the pork that was on the table, he shot it down so rapidly that all eyes became fixed upon him, little suspecting that the corned beef on the table was doomed to follow it instanter. Having achieved the beef, he perceived near to him two fine young cabbages, the first that had been gathered that summer; these, which were the German's own dear dish, he had the inexpressible horror to see disappear in a twinkling, down the implacable throat of the omnivorous tin-peddler. Rising from his seat, full of wrath, the farmer now shoved a huge dish of unskinned, seedy potatoes to the fellow, that were there for the family, and screamed out: "Will you swallow de potatoes, too, mit me dish und de skins? I should like to see dat." "No," said the Yankee, "I guess I telled you I'd only jist look at your taters; it ain't so long to supper time, but I can hold on."—N. Y. Ledger.

CLEVER DETECTIVES.

Inspector Byrne Talks About the Traits They Must Possess.

"How do men become detectives, any way? What training and natural traits must a man have?" asked a New York reporter of Inspector Byrne.

"That is a hard question to answer off hand," said the inspector, slowly. "The most important thing, I should say, is that men have a distinct liking —an undoubted passion—for this line of duty. That is essential.

"A man must like the business and know that he likes it, that he has a natural aptitude for it. That is the indispensable prerequisite. Then he must have perseverance, youth, intelligence, enthusiasm for his work. He must be thorough and zealous, and especially he must be tenacious. A good officer will lay his plans and go over a case, and perhaps fail; then he goes back and begins all over again, doing his work in the second line as carefully as at first; perhaps he will fail again, perhaps a half dozen times, but he has the bull-dog in him and is up and at it again. That's the kind of a man that succeeds in this business; the man who does something hard does it by patience, persistence and tenacity. Why, I wouldn't give a cent to do something any body can do. if a man is shot down here in the street and an officer on the opposite side runs across and arrests the murderer, there's no credit in it.

"But in talking about the personal traits a detective should possess to do good work. I must not neglect to say that all these are of no avail if he does not have a thorough knowledge of professional criminals. Without this he can do nothing. Of course the large proportion of crimes are crimes against property — thieving in one form or another."

"How is the knowledge acquired?" I asked.

"O, in various ways; by visiting their haunts, perhaps, or some naturally pick it up in knocking about New York. If a young man of inquiring turn of mind sees a fellow who seems a little suspicious he inquires about him, takes notes and perhaps talks with him. This local knowledge of criminals gradually widens, for all professionals come here at one time or another, the budding detective sees new faces and keeps his records as he picks up information. Then he must study classes of crime. Professional criminals are very clannish; they run in gangs, the bank sneaks together, the hotel men, and so on through all classes of work. They are all grouped and classified."—N. Y. Daily News.

CHARITY IN CHINA.

How Food is Dispensed to the Poor and Needy of Peking.

On the first day of the tenth moon (15th of November) the winter charities are opened in Peking for the dispensing of food. When the cold season is further advanced the distribution of clothing is made and the almshouses become filled. Two of our reporters recently made a tour of inspection among the charities in the south city of Peking. All the institutions visited were supported by imperial bounty. The first one reached was a porridge kitchen, a little east of the great central city gate Ch'ien Men. The "granary rice" was already cooked and waiting hot in the great wooden tubs usually found in such places; but although it was nine o'clock none of the poor people had arrived. The explanation of this unusual lateness is that at a place half a mile away they were drawing the rations of good millet porridge first. The granary rice is of bad quality, and the people much prefer the millet. The second place visited was one where sound millet porridge was served, and there men, women and children to the number of 1,200 were waiting in great rooms or barracoons the distribution of the food. It soon began. Two files marched out simultaneously, men on one side, women and children on the other, each person carrying a vessel of some kind into which with great expedition a dipper of hot millet porridge was ladled. Most of the recipients returned to their homes to eat, but many homeless ones found quiet places in wood-yards and sunny corners of the streets to finish up the millet while hot, and then go to the place where the rice already mentioned was waiting for them. At the third place visited the dispensing was already over, only five hundred applicants having presented themselves to-day, most of them, as usual, being women and children.

This was one of the departments or branches of a large and expansive charity under the title "Hundred Goodnesses." The functionary in charge informed us that several thousand sometimes were fed. A few steps further on were the free schools of this same charity, and still further to the west at a short distance the winter's lodgings known as "The Warm Quarters." This is appropriated for women and children, fifty or sixty of whom had already arrived. They receive porridge of millet and granary rice twice a day, on which they subsist during the winter. The "warm quarters" number eight in the south city, and were opened about ten years ago in addition to the regular official almshouses. The administration of the charity leaves little to be desired, many thousands of poor people being housed, fed and clothed during the winter in a perfectly efficient manner.—Chinese Times.

CHEAP FUEL GAS.

A Valuable Invention Perfected by a Pittsburgh Syndicate.

For eighteen months and over Mr. George Westinghouse, Jr., after associating with himself the most skilled gas and engineering experts, has been endeavoring to solve the problem of manufacturing fuel gas. Associated with him, among others, were S. T. Wellman and T. Goetz. These gentlemen now announce the entire success of their labors, and recently gave a public exhibition of the fuel gas they are making at the Fuel Gas and Electric Engineering Company's works. The problem these gentlemen had to unravel was by no means an easy one. It was, briefly summed up, to discover how to manufacture a maximum amount of fuel gas having a high heating power, from a single ton of any class of coal, with a minimum loss during process of manufacture, of the total heat limits originally contained in coal.

The obstacles which had rendered all former inventions for this purpose useless were many. They each required a special character of coal: too great a proportion of the coal was consumed in gassification, and too little converted into gas; the manufactured gas was odorless, and consequently dangerous, the amount of incombustible gas contained was so great as to render pipeline transportation expensive.

The process of manufacture employed by the new company is quite simple. The coal or illuminating gas is first driven out of the gas, the coke, which is an essential part of the process, being then used either alone or with raw coal to produce generator gas, but of a much higher efficiency than other gases. Ordinary water gas is made from the coke not used. These gaseous products are then mixed and form the ultimate product of the process in its entirety.

The mechanical appliances employed, although new and elaborate in design, are so simple in operation that a plant capable of manufacturing 1,000,000 cubic feet of gas every twenty-four hours can be operated by three men and a boy, with alternate shifts of twelve hours each. The low cost at which this gas can be manufactured renders it a substantial rival to natural gas, and will prove of immense advantage to Pittsburgh. Should the natural supply run out, fuel gas could be manufactured at prices to enable local manufacturers to maintain their supremacy.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

—"Lady Clare Vere De Vere," said Queen Victoria to one of the ladies of the royal household the other day, "hand me the morning paper. It contains my speech in Parliament yesterday, and I have not yet read it. I have a woman's curiosity to know what I said on that occasion."—Norristown Herald.

True to Baby Brother.

"Chancellorsville is up the river from Fredericksburg," said old man Plunkett, "and I think it's what was afterward called the "Wilderness," when old Gen. Grant got down there. Thar's er world of pine land erlong there, but they ain't the long pines like we have in Georgia; they are kind of stubby like, and the limbs come down nearly to the ground, and I seed Gen. Wright on er horse what they said the ladies of Augusta give to him to go er sailing ermong them limbs, and got his long hair tangled up eround them and liked to have got snatched offen the horse's back.

"Hooker was the Yankee general at Chancellorsville, and the boys among the Yankees would tell from our fellows from ercross the river how he'd fight, and Mr. Lincoln come down to Fredericksburg and reviewed the army, and we could see them on the other side of the river, and our fellows begin to think that they wouldn't have old Burnsides to deal with, but Hooker couldn't do nothing with Lee nor none of 'em, as long as he had anything like an army.

"The bombshells set the woods on fire and their was er lots of follows burned, and if ever you seed fighting it was there. The Confeds had just ran the Yankees back and held possession of the field, and when the woods caught on fire the Yankees tried to regain the ground so as to save their wounded, but they jist might as well been er butting ergin Stone mountain for the Confeds wanted to save their wounded too, and they stood.

"But I seed er little girl over to the left of the old Chancellorsville tavern that they couldn't make run by their balls, but that there fire what I've told you erbout made her get up.

"The little girl's folks were refugeed folks, and they were living in er little house out in the wilderness by some old gold mines. The mother had went up the river and got cut off from her home, and the little girl, erbout twelve years old, was taking care of the house and the little baby boy, and the fighting soon got so fierce that it was safer to lay down at one place than it was to try and run, so she stayed and hugged the little brother close in her arms, and lay down on the floor till she heard the fire er cracking and er roaring, and then she riz, and with the baby boy in her arms, and her hair all streaming down her back, with nothing on her head, she pitched out amidst the shower of lead, and the soldiers seed her and begin to cheer, and that seemed to get her faster, till her foot caught in er bush and tripped her and threw her down, and the little baby fell erway in front of her, and er bomb bursted and tore up the dirt not more than twenty feet in front, but she never left her little brother. She grabbed him and started ergin, and the Yankees ceased firing and the soldiers of both sides cheered worse than ever, and the whole line pulled off their caps and waved to the little lady as she went over the brow of the hill. I hope she lived to see the days of peace restored, and I hope she may raise up a family as true to the old flag as she was to her little baby brother."—Atlanta Constitution.

The Problem of London.

For three centuries one of the great feats of thinking persons has been the enormous growth of London; and yet, till about a hundred years ago, neither its population nor its area were what we should now call abnormal. But since the last hundred years it has advanced by leaps and bounds, increasing its population fourfold within this century, and its area at least ten or fifteen fold. Even in my own lifetime the area of London has increased at least fivefold and its population between two and threefold. So that now we have a continuous population of some four millions, packed in an area not far off 100 square miles, with nearly 2,000 miles of streets, hardly anywhere less than ten or eleven miles in a straight line.

Every year 70,000 souls, roughly-speaking, are added by immigration and births; every year more square miles are added to the area. Year by year some 20,000 immigrants press into this city; that is the population of a fair county town, so that every ten years there is added to London by immigration alone a city as large as Bristol or Lisbon; and by the entire series of causes, a new city as large as St. Petersburg or Vienna. And thus, already, in this corner of the Thames there is huddled together about one-sixth of the entire population of England.

From Charing Cross or the Royal Exchange a man has to walk some five or six miles before he can see the blessed meadows or breathe the country air. Few of us ever saw more than half of the city we live in, and some of us never saw nine-tenths of it. We all live more or less in soot and fog, in smoky, dusty, contaminated air, in which trees will no longer grow to full size and the sulphurous vapor of which eats away the surface of stone. The beautiful river, our once silver Thames, is a turbid, muddy receptacle of refuse; at times indescribably nasty and unwholesome. The water we drink is continually polluted with drainage, and at times comes perilously near to being injurious to health. Our burying places, old and new, are a perpetual anxiety and danger. Our sewers pour forth 5,500,000 tons of sewerage per week, almost all of it wastefully and dangerously discharged. An immense proportion of our working population are insufficiently housed in cheerless, comfortless and even unhealthy lodgings. Not a few of these are miserable dens or squalid cabins, unfit for human dwelling place. Every few years some epidemic breaks out, which carries off its thousands. In some four-fifths of London the conditions of life are sadly depressing and sordid, with none of the advantages which city life affords.

Strong Liquors a Modern Invention

Strong liquors are a modern invention. The ancients knew of nothing more powerful than light fermented wines, and have left warnings enough of the abuse of them. Alcohol was not discovered till the seventh century, although an older story exists of a monk, Marcus, who collected and condensed in wool the steam of heated wine, and then pressed out from the wool, a balsam which he applied to the wounds of those who fell at the siege of Rheims, in the reign of Clovis I. He also mixed this balsam with honey, and produced a cordial which brought the moribund back to life. Clovis, however, did not wait for the approach of death before claiming his share of the cordial.

According to Dr. Sanford Chaille, the distillation of spirits from wine was not discovered till the twelfth century, and spirits did not come into common use as a drink until the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Prof. Arnoldus de Villanova, in the fourteenth century, made a panacea of the water of life, which gave sweet breath and fortified the memory, besides being good for sore eyes, the toothache and the gout, and having other wonderful properties. Distilled spirits came into use in 1359, and had to be prohibited in 1494. Michael Savonarola produced a treatise on making the water of life in the fifteenth century, which became a standard authority on the subject, and was followed by Matthioli de Sienna. These books gave the start to brandy making in Italy, whence the trade extended to France.

About 1520 the Irish usquebaugh began to acquire reputation in England. Before 1601 "brand wine" had come to be distilled in the Low Countries from apples, pears and malt, and in that year an ordinance was passed at Tourneay forbidding the sale of the liquor except by apothecaries, partly "because of the dearness of coin, and partly because of the drunkedness which this cheap brand wine caused, to the great prejudice not alone of homes and lives, but to the extreme danger to the souls of the drinkers, many of whom had died without confession."

The art of extracting alcohol from other substances was gradually discovered, and liquors of various names came into use. The trade grew great, and the present century has seen a new development of it in the general application of the art of "doctoring" liquors.—Popular Science Monthly.

A Millionaire's Way of Doing It.

The other day I asked the millionaire Senator from California, "How would you abolish beggery?"

"There is only one way," he said. "Dry up the source—abolish the conditions that make beggars. To try to cure poverty by street charity is like trying to stop a hole in your roof by mopping up the puddles that gather on your floor."

I asked him if he would specify the conditions.

"Yes," he said, "I can vaguely indicate them. Let me say, in the first place, that it is not millionaires that cause poverty. Nobody is worse off because the Vanderbilts are worth $200,000,000. If they had not the wealth it would not exist at all. It is only in those communities where millionoires are possible that the average citizen has enough to eat. Now what causes poverty.

"First—Ignorance of how to save money. I found beggars in California in 1840, when any man could go out with a tin pan and earn $5 before breakfast. When by working three hours a day a man could make his board and clothes, there were always shiftless creatures around whom the rest had to support. It is the same way now. The soil is wonderfully fruitful there. Merely 20,000 men produce all the wheat of the State, and export 1,000,000 tons of it every year, and yet there are beggars. We can cut, thresh and sack wheat at an expense of one and a half cents per 100 pounds, potatoes cost only half a cent a pound, and flour is only $4 a barrel, and there is want. An important cause is unthrift. People do not understand economy or practice it, as almost every rich man has had to at some time in his life. I really believe that there would be beggars in the world before night if $20 gold pieces were to be sown broadcast every morning, and so distributed that every man, woman and child were certain to get some.

"Second—The sale and use of liquor. As long as there are ten times as many saloons in this country as there are of both churches and schools, and they are mainly supported by the very poor, the sources of misery are pretty obvious.

"Third—A lack of manual training. This last need is most serious. If so many people could be taught trades that the entire product of this country were doubled next year the wages would be doubled, either in increase of money received, or in the smaller cost of the necessities of life to be bought. More capable skilled hands—that is one of our greatest needs. My great hope is in my university, which I wish to build so tall and deep and broad that the rudiments of every useful trade and occupation may be taught. When everybody knows how to do some difficult and useful thing poverty will rapidly diminish."

The Seven Bibles of the World.

The three Vedas are the most ancient books of the Hindoos.

Moses lived and wrote his Pentateuch fifteen centuries before Christ.

The Eddads of the Scandinavians were first published in the fourteenth century.

The Zendavests of the Persians is the grandest of all the sacred books next to the Christian Bible. Zeroaster, whose sayings it contains, was born in the twelfth century before Christ.

The Pitikes of the Buddhists contain sublime morals and pure aspirations, but their author died in the sixth century before Christ. There is nothing of excellence in these sacred books not found in the Bible.

The Koran is the most recent of the seven bibles, and not older than the seventh century of the Christian era. It is a compound of quotations from the Old and New Testament, the Talmud, and the gospel of St. Barnabas.

The sacred writings of the Chinese are called the "Five Kings," King meaning web of cloth, or the warp that keeps the web in place. These sayings cannot be traced to a period higher than the seventh century before Christ.

When the recent great storm swept over Aurora county, Dak., Eric Johnsen, a farmer near Plankinto, was watering his cattle some distance from the buildings. He became exhausted in his attempt to drive his cattle home. Among the cattle was a very large ox, which lay down to die near where Johnson was making his last struggle for life in the snow. Johnson in a moment of inspiration, killed the ox, disembowled it, and crawled inside. He was completely sheltered from the storm and passed the night in safety. When morning dawned, however, and he endeavored to crawl out, he was horrified to find that he was completely frozen in. He had left his knife sticking in the carcass outside. He cried for assistance, and it was not until 2½ P. M. that his cries were answered by a party who were searching for him. He was none the worse for his experience, except that he was cramped and sore.

Husband—"I never saw a woman so hard to please as you are, my dear." Wife (calmly)—"I am not so sure about that, John. I married you, you know.—New York Sun.

THE rapid advance made by The Morning Herald during the past year, has been a marvel to all familiar with the subject. Not only has the volume of advertising been immensely large, but the increase in circulation is without a precedent in the history of Baltimore journalism. The cause of this is apparent. The Morning Herald was a better paper in 1887 than in the preceding year. It will be a better paper in 1888 than in 1887. It will continue to be the cheapest of dailies—one cent being the price. It publishes all the Associated Press News. It has a complete corps of correspondents throughout Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Southern Pennsylvania and other states, thus being able to promptly furnish the news for a widely extended region. Its LOCAL NEWS is preeminently the fullest and most accurate of any Baltimore daily. Its Washington Correspondence is bright, and covers the vast field of National Politics which center at the National Capital. It proposes to publish the most exhaustive and comprehensive reports of legislative doings at Annapolis. It is absolutely independent in politics. Its utterances upon public topics are impartial and fearless. It is cheap, able, bright. These are the reasons for the constantly increasing popularity of The Morning Herald.

THERE is no Sunday paper in any city of the Union, the pages of which are more replete with news, with bright contributions, with able articles especially prepared by writers of national distinction, and with letters on engrossing topics from the leading literateurs of the day. The Sunday Herald is acknowledged to be the gem of Baltimore journalism. Its special cable reports are more complete than those of any paper south of New York. It is the only Baltimore paper that publishes a regular letter from Richmond, the only one that publishes full reports of Society events throughout Maryland and Virginia. Its sporting news is noticeably superior to that of all rivals, and it excels in all the elements that go to make up an attractive, able and readable Sunday journal.

The Weekly Herald is indisputably the cheapest weekly published in the United States. It consists of eight pages almost entirely devoted to reading matter. Each issue contains a whole page of Maryland news. A full synopsis of the debates in Congress, the laws passed, Senate and House proceedings, and the cream of the news from the National Capital. It will, as usual, publish each week the Talmage sermon, together with a long list of contributions from leading writers. Its market reports are unexcelled for completeness and reliability. Its literary department is bright: It is the paper for the home and the shop, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the artisan, and for all who want the best paper for the price ever published.

☞ At great expense, a complete ART DEPARTMENT has been added to the equipments of the HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, and, beginning the fourth week in January, the pages of each edition of the paper will be replete with illustrated articles and sketches. The illustration of the important news of the day has grown to be a necessity which has been promptly recognized by The Morning Herald without regard to outlay.
